Now, I appeal to Senators to know whether this policy is to be carried out, whether it is designed to increase the duty upon manufactured articles, almost to a prohibitory extent, and then force us to pay on necessary articles all that may be required to pay the interest of the public debt; and after this bill shall have been passed then reduce the internal taxation upon manufactured goods? Is that the purpose? Why not openly proclaim it now, and let us put on duty enough at once, and let it all stand in the name of tariff; let it stand and be known as a bounty to that interest? If the purpose is to make the absolute necessities of life pay the interest upon the public debt, and to impose prohibitory duties upon articles which may be manufactured in this country, and then to reduce five per cent. internal revenue upon manufactured articles, I believe the people will sooner or later ascertain what this tariff bill means.

I have desired to move some amendments, and I hope that some will be adopted, but from the purpose manifested by the Senate now I have no idea that it will be done. Although I dislike as much as anybody to differ with a majority of those gentlemen with whom I act politically here, I shall be pardoned for suggesting to them that the majority of the western people are not in favor of any such duties. That is the general policy of this bill. I do not know what the committee of conference may do, but I apprehend from the purpose manifested and from the indications of the purpose which are apparent, that inasmuch as there must be a reduction of taxation, it will be made entirely in the internal revenue after the passage of this tariff bill. Mr. President, it ought to be known by the people of this country, and it will be known, that the articles of absolute necessity are the articles having the highest ad valorem duty in the bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope this proposition will not be entertained. When you come to sugars the argument used as to tea and coffee does not apply. The fact is that the duty on sugar is one of the leading stays of the revenue. We get about twenty-eight millions of revenue, I think, from sugars.

Mr. HENDERSON. Not quite that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very nearly. Then there are various considerations connected with the subject. In the first place, a duty is laid upon the cheap sugars to protect and encourage the raising and manufacture of sugar in the sugar-producing regions of this country, in the South, where at one time it was a very considerable interest and I hope will be again. It has been my wish—and other gentlemen have agreed with me that it would be no more than right—to take off the internal tax on sugar for the sake of encouraging its production and manufacture at the South; and a duty on low-priced foreign sugars is necessary for the same purpose.

It is necessary for another purpose. There is a very large amount of capital invested in the manufacture of cheap sugars out of molasses; and if you change this duty you will have to make changes in many other particulars, and there is great danger of destroying that interest.

Then, with regard to the duties on the higher grades: they are already so low that we have been applied to very strongly on the part of the New York refiners to raise the duties on those sugars for the reason that they say there is a new process by which these sugars, without being refined, come so near it that they are in danger of being broken up. We did not change the sugar duties. The House Committee of Ways and Means examined the subject with great care, and the House adhered to the duties as they stand. We examined the matter with care, and rejected all applications to raise the duties on sugars and agreed to let them stand as they are. I hope the Senate will not change them, for I assure them they cannot interfere with the duties on sugar without seriously endangering the revenue of the country.

Mr. DAVIS. If I recollect aright, for a series of years the duties upon coffees and teas were nothing or merely nominal; and why was it so? The considerations were two: first, because these articles were not produced in our country, and to tax them was not necessary to protect American industry; and secondly, they were articles of general, universal consumption, and they were consumed in as large or a larger degree by the laborers, the poor, as by the rich. It was for the purpose, then, of letting in free and reducing to the lowest possible price what was necessary to pay for these articles of general use, of universal necessity, that did not come into conflict with any American industry or product, that that system was established. If that system was wise and statesmanlike and necessary in former years, it is more so now. The great mass of the people, the consumers, the laborers, who are the real bone and sinew of the country, and upon whom rest its progress and its prosperity and wealth, are the population who were intended to be and were relieved by that system of legislation. They are entitled to and require more relief in that direction now than formerly, because their industry is not rewarded now with the same certainty nor with an equal amount of profit that it was formerly. They are taxed now in such a variety of forms and to such an amount that they have no profits upon their labor in most cases.

I conceive that this term tariff has the significance intimated by the Senator from Missouri; it is not intended to protect the laborer, the consumer; it is intended to protect capital and manufacturing companies and aggregated wealth, and to multiply the already enormous accumulations of wealth in the hands of the few. I think with the honorable Senator from Missouri that the people of the country will wake up before long to this system of legislation.

If it was possible to establish infallibly the principle that every man of the community should pay taxes according to his ability, it would be the just rule. The principles upon which this bill was framed seem to be in hostility to that general and equitable principle; the great mass of taxation is made to fall upon the laboring classes of the people, those who have the least surplus and the least means to meet the burden; and those who have the most and who are reveling in wealth and who are aggregating from day to day princely fortunes, are comparatively exempt from the burden, and it is left to fall with all its grinding force upon the laborers, the great consuming classes of the country. I hope that this amendment will prevail.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have in my hands the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and the Senator from Maine will see from that report that if he relies upon the manufacture of sugar from the sugar-cane in this country to supply its wants he relies upon a broken stick.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I did not say we did in this country, except what we propose to raise down South. I know there is very little raised now, but we hope to improve.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator is as well aware of the fact as I am that no sugar can be produced in the State of Louisiana next year, and that is really our only sugar-producing State. It is as impossible to do it as it was last year. It cannot be done. The levees have not been built. There was a proposition here at the last session, I believe, to levee the Mississippi so as to protect the sugar lands of that country; but it was not done, and the State of Louisiana has not been able to negotiate her bonds. From the vast amount of snow that has fallen on the upper waters of the Missouri and Mississippi we know that the lower Mississippi will next spring and summer be probably higher than has been known for years. The snows now are from eighteen inches to five and six feet upon the headwaters of both these streams, and the most certain fact is that the entire country will be flooded. As to growing any sugar-cane in Louisiana next summer, it is wholly out of the question; nobody calculates upon any such thing who knows anything about that country.

Mr. FOWLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri one question connected with that argument. Supposing that Louisiana shall produce sugar, do you propose to tax the other States from seventy to eighty-five per cent. to pay the planters of Louisiana for the small amount of sugar they raise there?

Mr. HENDERSON. I was not so arguing. I was answering the Senator from Maine, who, I understood, contended that it was necessary to protect the home manufacturer of this article.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Protect and encourage.

Mr. HENDERSON. Now, Mr. President, let us look at the internal revenue figures. On sugar not above No. 12, Dutch standard, produced from the sugar-cane, the amount of revenue paid into the Treasury last year from the State of Louisiana was $205,629 28; from the State of Georgia, $85 88; from the State of Massachusetts, $315; from the State of New Jersey, $260; from the State of New York, $500; and from the State of Texas, $754. The whole bulk of it comes from Louisiana, and the aggregate was $207,000. On sugar above No. 12 and below No. 18, Dutch standard, the State of Louisiana gave us $215,000, and the other States in about the same proportion as before, little or nothing. Upon sugar above No. 18, Dutch standard, the State of Louisiana paid only $14,904.

Thus it will be seen that the position of the Senator from Maine, to take off the internal revenue taxes in order to encourage the production of the article here, does us no good; it does not furnish us any sugar. We got less last year than the year before.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Double from Louisiana this year over last year—sixty thousand hogsheds. Nothing in the country has increased so fast comparatively as the production of sugar.

Mr. HENDERSON. The year before last we could not get any from Louisiana because it was utterly impossible to get it through the lines. If anybody brought sugar out of Louisiana in 1864 he had to run the blockade with it. My proposition is to reduce the tax upon the coarse article of sugar, and I suggest to the Senator from Maine if it is not an encouragement to the manufacturers. Does he desire to encourage the refining of sugar? The sugar-refiners in New York paid into the Treasury last year $1,198,122 21 internal taxation, more than all the internal revenue raised from the manufacture of sugar in the same time by three. What was it that they refined? It was the coarse sugars from other countries; not our native sugars. Then let us encourage their manufacture. There are now a large number of people in this country engaged in refining sugar. A large quantity of it is refined in St. Louis, in my State. I am not, however, looking to the protection of the manufacturers in my State. They have not clamored around my ears; they have not written me letters upon the subject. I believe they are satisfied. The sugar-refiners there do not ask me to urge the reduction of this tax, nor do any class of manufacturers in my State. The iron manufacturers of that State have said nothing to me about having anything done for their benefit. They do not desire an increase. They are perfectly willing to let the tariff alone as it is; at least they think it is high enough. The Senate will find that in the State of Massachusetts this article of refining sugar gave us over $300,000 last year. The State of Pennsylvania gave us $337,000 on sugar refining.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator what the tariff on sugar was then?

Mr. HENDERSON. The same as now. I do not think it has been altered. I think it is the same as it was under the previous law. But in answer to that I will simply say to the Senator from Oregon that I consented to these high duties myself in the midst of a war that absolutely seemed at the time to require that each and every individual should divide his property with the Government. The Senator knows that fact. I would have voted at that time to go in upon the farmers of my State and taken part and parcel of their property to put down this rebellion. But now that the rebellion is over is it necessary to continue these high rates of duty upon an indispensable article—one of necessity among the people everywhere? It is a coarse article of sugar that is worth a little over four cents a pound. To lessen the duty encourages the sugar-refiners, and not only that, it gives cheap sugar to the people. I insist that for the benefit of the people of the western States this reduction should be made, and it can be made without injuring the revenue. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 12, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Fowler, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Kirkwood, Lane, Patterson, Ramsey, Trumbull, and Yates—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Cattell, Chandler, Connors, Cowan, Crazin, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fogg, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Harris, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill, Poland, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—26.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Creswell, Dixon, Guthrie, McDougall, Nesmith, Norton, Nye, Pomeroy, Riddle, Ross, Saulsbury, and Sumner—14.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask the indulgence of the Senate for a moment while I offer one amendment. On page 36, section seven, at the end of line two hundred and sixty-one, I propose to add the following:

And in addition thereto, on knives and pocket cutlery valued at two dollars per dozen and over, fifty cents per dozen.

So that the clause will read:

On pocket-knives and pocket cutlery of all kinds, fifty-five per cent. ad valorem; and, in addition thereto, on knives and pocket cutlery valued at two dollars per dozen and over, fifty cents per dozen.

The House bill imposed the following duty on these articles:

On pocket-knives and pocket cutlery of all kinds, valued at not over five dollars per dozen, seventy-five cents per dozen, and, in addition thereto, fifty per cent. ad valorem; valued at over five dollars per dozen, two dollars per dozen, and, in addition thereto, fifty per cent. ad valorem.

This amendment proposes fifty cents per dozen as a specific duty on all knives costing two dollars per dozen and over. The House bill proposed seventy-five cents per dozen on all knives not costing over five dollars per dozen, and two dollars per dozen on all knives costing over five dollars per dozen. It is true that by the House bill they imposed but fifty per cent. ad valorem, and the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance proposes fifty-five; but the five per cent. ad valorem additional would be of course no comparison in amount with the seventy-five cents specific duty on all knives not costing over five dollars per dozen, and two dollars on all knives costing over five dollars; so that the duty which I propose on this amendment is really very much less than the House bill.

Now, Mr. President, upon all the commodities which are used by the manufacturers of these knives, so far as there has been alteration made, and there has been considerable, the duties have been increased very considerably by the Senate bill over the House bill, while the duties on these articles are diminished. I submit that that is not equal and exact justice.

It violates the principle on which the bill should rest—an increase of duty in proportion to the increase of labor.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the Senator from Connecticut tell me a single case in which the Senate have proposed higher rates of duty than the House bill.

Mr. FOSTER. On grindstones; on emery.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator is mistaken in that. The House bill proposed five dollars a ton on grindstones, and I believe my colleague finally got the Senate to consent to three dollars.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No; he failed in that. We put it at five dollars on the finished article and ten per cent. on the unfinished.

Mr. FOSTER. The Senate raised the amount reported by the Committee on Finance?

Mr. FESSENDEN. No.

Mr. SHERMAN. I cannot recall a single article on which the Senate bill raises the duty above the House rates.

Mr. FOSTER. I was wrong in saying the Senate raised the amount over the House bill. What I meant to say was that the Senate had increased in some cases the amount of duties reported by our Finance Committee on the commodities which are used by the manufacturers of these articles. Now, in order that justice may be done to these manufactures we should certainly increase the amount of duty imposed on these articles imported, if we have increased the amount of duties recommended by the Finance Committee on those articles entering into their manufacture; and I cannot but believe that the honorable chairman himself is satisfied that this is no more than a reasonable increase of duty.

Mr. President, I challenge comparison on this subject with any other article which is now manufactured in the country showing a decrease in price for the last two years. In 1864 the five different grades of knives that are manufactured in this country were sold in New York at these prices: $2 75 per dozen for one description, and now that same class of American knives is sold in New York for $2 50 per dozen. Another class which two years ago were sold at $3 30 per dozen, are now sold at $3 per dozen. Another class that were sold two years ago at $6 32½ per dozen, are now sold at $5 75 per dozen. Another class that were sold two years ago for $10 55 per dozen, are now sold for $9 50 per dozen; and another class that were sold at $22 per dozen are now sold for $20 per dozen. There is no article of American manufacture, in my opinion, that can show such a decrease in price in the last two years when commodities of all sorts, as a general thing, have been rising.

The English knives of these same grades two years ago were sold in New York at prices higher than the American knives by $1 per dozen in one case, $1 70 in another, $1 84½ in another, $2 05 in another, and $1 75 in another. Two years ago the English knives cost those several sums more than the American knives. Now, however, unfortunately for the American manufacturer this is all reversed, and English knives of the first grade are sold in New York to-day for forty cents per dozen less than the American, the next twenty cents, the next $1 20, the next $2 50, and the next $6 70.

I submit to Senators, under these circumstances, that an increase of duty such as I have proposed is the least that will enable the American manufacturer to keep in the market. I put it to Senators that here is as good an exemplification of the effect of the American system on an American industry as we can ever expect to see; that is, by the imposition of a duty we have brought down the price of the article very considerably. The English, however, have reduced theirs in two years below ours, manifestly intending to get the market; and if they do get it the price will go back again to the old standard speedily, because there will be no competition. With this additional specific duty of fifty cents per dozen on knives costing over two dollars per dozen the advantage will still be in favor of the English manufacturer; but the importation will not be decreased below the amount which is now imported, and the revenue therefore will not suffer. The domestic manufacture, however, if this trifling addition is allowed to be put upon the bill, will, I think, be saved, and the price to the consumer will be less at the end of a year than though we reduced this duty. I have a right to say that, Mr. President, because two years ago, when the English price was above ours, by protecting our home article we brought down the English below ours; so that I do not speak hypothetically; I speak with demonstration in my hand. I hope, therefore, that this trifling addition will be allowed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER put the question on the amendment, and declared that the yeas appeared to have it.

Mr. SPRAGUE called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 8, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cowan, Edmunds, Foster, Harris, Howe, Morrill, Sprague, and Wilson—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Bucklew, Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Cragin, Davis, Doolittle, Fessenden, Fogg, Fowler, Frothinghuysen, Hendricks, Johnson, Kirkwood, Lane, Morgan, Patterson, Ramsey, Sherman, Stewart, Trumbull, Wade, Wiley, Williams, and Yates—25.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Creswell, Dixon, Grimes, Guthrie, Henderson, Howard, McDougall, Nesmith, Norton, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Riddle, Ross, Saulsbury, Sumner, and Van Winkle—19.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HENDERSON. On page 86, section thirteen, line sixty-three, I move to strike out "twenty-four cents per hundred pounds" and to insert "eighty per cent. ad valorem;" so that the clause will read:

On salt in bulk, and on all rock salt or mineral salt, eighty per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. President, that is ten per cent. higher than the duty upon any article of silk goods imported; it is as high as the tariff upon woolen goods generally; and it really seems to me that the tax upon salt ought to be as cheap as upon the more luxuries of life. I ask for the yeas and nays on this amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to ask of the Senator from Missouri, as he has examined this question, what reduction his amendment will be upon the bill itself in the tax upon salt?

Mr. HENDERSON. I can state to the Senator that in 1865 we imported two hundred and seventy million pounds of salt, costing us thirteen cents per hundred pounds. This bill proposes to tax that article costing thirteen cents, twenty-four cents. I propose to put it at eighty per cent., which will be ten and four tenths cents on each one hundred pounds.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not intend to discuss this at any length; but it seems to me that the friends of the bill ought to agree to a proposition so reasonable as this.

Mr. SHERMAN. This is the old tax. There is no change.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is suggested to me that the report of the committee is the old tax. I am not able to see that that is an important consideration. If the old tax is what it ought not to be now, as we are in the work of revising the tariff, we ought to make it what it ought to be.

Mr. HENDERSON. Taxes, like revolutions, never go back.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, Mr. President, that is one of the troubles. When you put a tax on an article, it is almost impossible ever to reduce it again; and here is the argument now applied to salt that everybody needs that we need in very large quantities in the western countries to preserve our meats. Because the tax in the midst of the war, when all the comforts and necessities of life were taxed to the people, had to be very high, the argument now is that we ought not to reduce it.

Mr. HENDERSON. The tax under the old law was eighteen cents, not twenty-four cents. This is an increase.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This is what was fixed by the House and sent to us.

Mr. HENDERSON. But this is not the present law. To suppose so is a mistake.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then I understand the facts to be, that the existing law taxes it eighteen cents, and the proposition of the bill now is to tax it twenty-four cents.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is it.

Mr. FOSTER. If the Senator from Indiana will allow me, if the importation continued the same the next year as last the addition of six cents per one hundred pounds would tax the country $355,637 35 on salt alone.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, sir. Now, the answer of the chairman of the committee is that this is the tax proposed by the House. Why, sir, the committee has repudiated the House bill and has adopted another bill. Why do we insist upon having the House bill upon this article, so absolutely necessary? We cannot reduce it, it seems, although the tax was put upon salt during the war; but instead of reducing it we propose to increase it one fourth, from eighteen up to twenty-four cents. I cannot think it is necessary to argue this question with the gentlemen that have an interest in this bill. They certainly ought to give some popular features to this bill, if it is possible to do so. Sir, this is a monstrous bill. When a thing so reasonable and right as this is asked it ought not to be resisted, by the friends of the bill. Here is a necessary of life that cannot be dispensed with, and the tax is unreasonable. If the statement of the Senator from Connecticut is to be relied upon (and I cannot question it, for he has examined the subject) the tax is most unreasonable. It is a tax that ought not to be put hardly upon a luxury. It would be a heavy tax upon whisky; a heavy tax upon brandies or wine.

Some ridicule was made of this the other day, that it did not amount to very much. It does amount to very much to us in the West. When we put up the hogs in the West we need the salt to preserve the meat. It is a tax upon the man who puts the meat up. The Senator from Missouri, who has examined this subject and who proposes this amendment, tells me that the tax proposed by the committee is one hundred and eighty-four per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. More than that.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Well, that is enough.

Mr. FOSTER. On a single cargo imported into New York last year it was one hundred and sixty-two per cent., when the tax stood at eighteen cents on the hundred pounds. This bill proposes to make it twenty-four cents.

Mr. HENDERSON. I take the whole importations of last year.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator from Missouri says, taking the entire importation of the year, twenty-four cents would be one hundred and eighty-four per cent. One hundred and eighty-four per cent. Senators know that that is a tax which will be paid, because salt must be had. If you tax salt five hundred per cent. everybody must still buy salt, because it is absolutely necessary to the comfort of the family; it is absolutely necessary to preserve the meat that is butchered all over the country; and the committee know very well that they will collect revenue in that way. Just so on sugar. They say it is important to the revenue. Of course it is; people must have sugar, and if you tax it three cents a pound of course the people must pay it, because they must have sugar. You tax coffee five or six cents a pound. It will not make much difference in the amount used, for people must have coffee. Then if you put the tax very high on manufactured articles, such as woollens and cottons, and exclude importations altogether, you destroy revenue by your prohibitory tariff, and give the monopoly of the market of the country to the home manufacturer at high prices, and rely upon the absolute necessities of life for the revenue. This salt duty is an illustration. I appeal to gentlemen to do what is now reasonable. Why, it is less than reasonable. The duty proposed by the Senator from Missouri is altogether too much. I do not think salt ought to be taxed at all. Wherever it can be had it ought to be obtained at the very cheapest possible rate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope this duty will not be changed. The Senate has already passed upon the question once, and the House too. I hope the Senate will adhere to it.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 14, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Doolittle, Foster, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Kirkwood, Lane, Patterson, Sprague, Trumbull, Wilson, and Yates—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Cattell, Chandler, Connors, Cragin, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fogg, Frelinghuysen, Harris, Howard, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill, Poland, Sherman, Stewart, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, and Williams—20.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Cowan, Creswell, Dixon, Fowler, Guthrie, Howe, McDougall, Nesmith, Norton, Nye, Pomroy, Ramsey, Riddle, Ross, Saulsbury, and Sumner—18.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to offer another amendment on page 65. I had some others reducing taxes, but I am satisfied nothing reducing taxes will be carried. I now propose to increase taxes. I wish now to propose an amendment on page 65, section nine, line six hundred and nine. The clause as reported by the committee reads:

On linseed or flaxseed, sixteen cents per bushel of fifty-two pounds weight.

That was changed to twenty cents, I believe. I now propose to strike out "twenty," and to insert "thirty;" so that it will read:

On linseed or flaxseed, thirty cents per bushel of fifty-two pounds weight.

Now, Mr. President, I will remark that the quotations of this article show that its average gold price in the foreign market is $1 30 per bushel, and if the duty be put at thirty cents it will only be twenty-three per cent. ad valorem. This is an article of western growth. It is an article that my constituents have been petitioning me upon, and I believe the only article. I have offered several petitions since the pendency of this bill on this subject, and I have put the figure exactly as they put it in their petitions. It is only twenty-three per cent. ad valorem. I know of nothing that is grown or produced upon the Atlantic sea-board or anywhere east of the Alleghany mountains that is put so low as this article. I propose a duty of thirty cents. I think that a fair average rate of duty with the other articles in the bill would justify me in placing it at fifty cents per bushel; but I propose simply thirty cents per bushel, and I hope the Senate will adopt it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We had this matter all thoroughly discussed, and it was settled finally by a sort of compromise in the Senate at twenty cents, and I hope the Senate will adhere to it.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HENDERSON. On page 82, section twelve, line seven, I propose to strike out the word "ten" and insert "twenty;" so as to read:

On hides, raw or uncured, whether dry, salted, or pickled, twenty per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HENDERSON. I see now that the Senate will neither diminish nor increase. There are a great many articles of western growth, produce, and manufacture, in regard to which I might offer amendments, but I am perfectly satisfied that no article now will be increased in the rate of taxation. Every proposition that is made is laughed to scorn. I now propose to strike out the twenty-second section of this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is that section? Let it be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Sec. 22. And be it further enacted, That on and after the 1st day of April, 1867, there shall be allowed and paid a drawback equal in amount to the import duty paid on all lumber, hemp, Manila, copper, and upon all iron not advanced in manufacture beyond rods, bars, and bolts, which shall be wrought up into the construction of rigging or equipment of sailing vessels of the United States, or used in repairing vessels of foreign build, documented in conformity with the provisions of the act of 23d December, 1852, less five per cent. on the amount of such drawback, which shall be retained for the use of the United States under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

Mr. HENDERSON. It will be observed that this section as it stands is an absolute discrimination in favor of a certain section of the country, and I desire to know whether the Senate in passing a tariff bill is disposed to discriminate in favor of vessels built in any particular section of this country. I wish to call the attention of the Senate and the attention of the country to the fact, and if gentlemen then wish to put their names on the record on the subject, they can do so.

Now, what is this proposition? I know that in Maine and in Connecticut it will be said that the commercial interests are flagging and that they are not now building the vessels that they built from 1856 up to 1860. I am aware of that, and I am perfectly willing to do anything in my power, that is not a piece of absolute and down-right injustice to any other section of the country, to advance that interest; and my opinion is that if my policy were adopted in reference to tariff measures, the tonnage of those States would increase as it did from 1856 to 1860. But a contrary policy is to be adopted. The commercial interests of the country are, in my judgment, to be prostrated. The entire amount of revenue that is to be collected to meet this vast public debt that is now hanging heavily upon the shoulders of the people of the United States is to be paid by a certain class or a certain interest in this country. Now, when it begins to pinch upon a particular section that section flinches. When it is ascertained that a ship cannot be built in New York, in Maine, in Connecticut, or in Rhode Island, under this bill, gentlemen in order to escape the inevitable effect of the bill say they will return to the ship-builder the amount of money that shall have been paid upon the articles entering into the construction of his vessels in the shape of a tariff duty.

If a vessel is built at the city of St. Louis or at the city of Pittsburgh or at the city of Wheeling or at the city of Cincinnati, I ask if there is any drawback to be paid to the owner of the vessel. Here is a proposition, not to encourage eastern manufacture, not to encourage western manufacturers, but an absolute inducement held out to the ship-owner and ship-builder to put the foreign manufacture into the vessel in order that he may obtain the drawback. This is a contradiction of the entire principle of this measure. As I understand it, it has been, from the beginning up to the last amendment that has been offered and voted down, to protect the manufacturing interests of the country. Sir, if the iron manufacturer, the hemp manufacturer, the rope-maker, the copper manufacturer are to be protected, let that protection stand in one case as well as in another. Are vessels to be built of foreign copper, of foreign hemp? Is foreign canvas to be used in their construction? Are the nails that enter into their construction to be of foreign manufacture, contrary to every principle that has entered into the framing of this measure? Why, sir, it returns to every man building a vessel of any size from ten to twenty thousand dollars as a bonus for using articles of foreign production in the construction.

Now, I desire to ask whether a vessel built in the West is to be excluded from the operation of this measure? Is the man who builds at Louisville or at St. Louis to have a drawback returned to him? No, sir; but the builder of every sailing vessel is to have it returned. Now, I ask what is the difference between sailing vessels and steamers. There are two great rivers on which are borne the productions of the West. One is the St. Lawrence, a continuation of the lakes, Lake Superior, Lake Michigan, Lake Ontario, and Lake Erie, and sailing vessels are built upon them. Are those sailing vessels to be exempted from the operations of this measure? I mean that portion of it which imposes duties. Are the duties to be returned to the manufacturer of a vessel that sails upon the St. Lawrence and not given back to those who build vessels on the Mississippi and Missouri rivers? Where is the justice of a measure of that character?

Mr. President, there are many things in this bill that might be considered; but the hour has long since passed when they can be considered. The mere fiat of one or two consigns every proposition to the grave. I care not how just, how equitable, or how righteous a proposition may be, it is disposed of by a mere word of contempt, a mere expression of the fact that it is already settled and compromised and fixed among gentlemen who compromise the great interests of the West, and have compromised them, in my judgment.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Wilson] this afternoon offered an amendment on the subject of woollens, increasing the rates of duty largely. Yesterday he and his colleague voted consistently to bury this bill as it ought to be buried. I want to know, since that has been adopted with the consent of the chairman of this important committee, whether he will vote against it now? Yesterday the able and distinguished Senator from Maine lectured the Senator on my left [Mr. SHERMAN] for changing the bill as it came from the committee, and much was I surprised when the Senator from Massachusetts who had voted against this bill again and again rise in his place and offered an amendment on the subject of woollens and thereby doing away with all his opposition, and that of his colleague, to the measure, to see the Senator from Maine, after having lectured his colleague on the committee, fall in and vote willingly for the proposition, and say that it was a good measure. Why, sir, anything is voted upon this bill when the committee say that it is right; anything is voted down when the committee say that it is wrong.

But, sir, I have said enough. I am sorry that some propositions I have offered are not to be accepted and will not be accepted; but if gentlemen desire to do so, they can go on and pass the measure as it stands and take the consequences before the country. I of course shall do all that I possibly can to reconcile the feelings of the people of my section to it, and shall endeavor to adapt the interests of the country as far as I possibly can to the measure. But to make me believe, as a representative of that section in which I live, that this measure is right, or that it will operate for the best interests of any section, is impossible. I believe that it is a combination simply of interests, and that the committee themselves, in many cases, have been imposed upon. I accord to them diligence; I accord to them patriotism; I accord to them all that I claim for myself; I accord to them nothing more. If the report of a committee is to be accepted, except where the committee itself deviates from it, you may abolish the Senate and dispense with all the rest of us. But, sir, if our views are worthy of consideration they ought to be treated at least with some respect.

What I have said I may possibly have said with some little excitement, but I trust it will be excused when I say that, in my judgment, every possible interest of my peculiar section is disregarded. No proposition that I have been able to make, either increasing rates in the West or decreasing them, has been adopted. On the article of raw hides, in which we are interested largely, I proposed an increase from five per cent. ad valorem to fifteen per cent., but I could not get it, although all the interests of the section near us here have been raised from eighty to one hundred per cent.

Mr. President, I shall content myself with the opposition I have made to this bill. I have various other amendments but I shall not offer more than one or two; perhaps not even that many, for I see that it is an utter impossibility to influence this body. They sit and calmly vote against any amendment that is laughed at, or that it is intimated by a member of the committee ought not to be adopted. We are told "the thing has all been examined, it has all been looked into;" and quietly, silently, and calmly all propositions that come from a certain direction are voted down. It avails nothing that an interest in my section suffers; but if the woolen interest of Massachusetts suffers, modifications are made, and all the opposition that was threatened from that quarter, I apprehend, has passed away to be revived no more. If the bill is to frustrate the great ship-building interest of Maine, how is that to be avoided? It is to be avoided by returning every dollar that is paid to the foreign manufacturer for the articles entering into the construction of the vessel. That is to be returned as a bonus to the man who makes the vessel. Yet, if I were to propose, with regard to vessels built at St. Louis or Galena or Louisville or other points along the western waters, that the same bounty should be returned to the builder, how would the proposition be received in this body?

Mr. President, let the fate of the few amendments I have offered answer the query. You know what would become of it. Am I to be told again "this thing has been considered in committee; we know how it stands; and the Senator from Missouri is ignorant of what he talks about?" Perhaps it is so; but I only crave the privilege of casting my vote in favor of striking out that section from this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, the question immediately before the Senate is the proposition of the honorable member from Missouri to strike out the section which allows a drawback in certain cases. If I understand the section the drawback is allowed in the case of all sailing vessels, no matter where they may be built. Originally it extended, I believe, to steam as well as sailing vessels; but as it stands now all sailing vessels, no matter where constructed, are entitled to the benefit of the drawback.

Before I say a word on the propriety of adopting that amendment, my friend from Missouri will permit me to say for myself that in the votes which I have given upon the several amendments which he has proposed to this bill, I have been governed exclusively by my own judgment, enlightened and instructed as that has been by the teaching of others. I certainly have had no purpose of enmity toward the West. I have no purpose in the vote which I am about to give on this amendment to benefit the East to the injury of the West. The honorable member is under the impression that the several amendments which have been rejected have been rejected without due consideration. In that, as far as I am concerned, he is totally mistaken. I know not by what right the honorable member assumes to himself peculiar knowledge upon the subjects to which his amendments referred. The tariff in all its modifications has been the subject of consideration for years, and we have had this particular bill under deliberation now for some nine or ten days, and we have been instructed not only by the members from the East, for we have listened to their opinions on that subject, but we have been instructed by and we have listened to the honorable member from Missouri. Nobody doubts that in everything that he has said he has been governed by an honest opinion that the interest, not of the West merely, but of the country requires the adoption of his amendments. Let him accord to those who happen to differ from him the same honesty of purpose; certainly, as far as I am concerned, situated in one of the middle States, I have been influenced exclusively by a desire to promote the interest of the entire country.

Now, a word as to the amendment. The honorable member seems to suppose that the interest which is to be protected by the bill as it stands, and which he proposes to change, is an interest peculiar to the East, to Maine—

Mr. HENDERSON. I did not say so. I spoke of the lakes also.

Mr. JOHNSON. The honorable member mentioned Maine half a dozen times, and he spoke of it as affecting the East generally—the sea-board. Now, is that true? Does the honorable member suppose that the people of Missouri are not interested in having an efficient commercial marine to carry on the foreign and domestic trade of the United States? Does he suppose that they have no interest in multiplying the men who are to carry the flag of our country upon every sea, and who can only be multiplied by increasing the commercial marine of the country? Is he oblivious to the fact that the reputation of the country has been increased so as to make us all proud of that marine, by means of the encouragement which we have heretofore extended to the commercial marine of the country? The late war, to say nothing of those which preceded it, has demonstrated that the arm of the country in case of danger is strengthened, and greatly strengthened, through the instrumentality of a commercial marine. And, therefore, in voting to encourage ship-building, as far as my judgment instructs me, I vote to foster, and to increase by fostering, that commercial marine.

My friend supposes that there is in that fact or in this particular measure which is to bring about that result an injury to the interest of the West—an indication of an enmity to the West. I am sure he will not attribute to me any such purpose. It happens, to repeat it again, to live in a State which stands between the extremes, and if I might be permitted to quote from a message sent to the Legislature of our own State by the Governor who was first elected by the people, I would say to the honorable member that that location is a peculiarly happy one in enabling us to decide upon the sectional differences which are to be found existing in either extreme. His language was, "That we are not given to the rude bores of northern fanaticism or the hot sinroom of southern impetuosity." We stand upon comparatively neutral ground, neutral as between the sections, not neutral, I trust in Heaven, in any contest which may involve the existence of the Government. Whenever that question shall arise, whether it may arise in a contest with foreign nations or among ourselves, the honorable member from Missouri will find that Maryland will be with Missouri in that contest, and will never agree to any measure, whether of internal or of external taxation, which may inflict an injury upon the West.

Mr. HENDERSON. With the permission of the Senator I should like to ask him a question before he concludes his remarks—

Mr. JOHNSON. I have concluded.

Mr. HENDERSON. What justice is there in allowing a drawback upon a sloop that is built at the city of Baltimore to run between Norfolk and Baltimore, and not giving a drawback to a vessel built at St. Louis?

Mr. JOHNSON. That is not the question, Mr. President.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is the question.

Mr. JOHNSON. It by no means follows that because a drawback is not given to vessels that are built on the Mississippi and on the Ohio it ought not to be given to any other vessels. If you cannot get it for the West, give it to the East.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask the Senator if he is in favor of giving it to the West.

Mr. JOHNSON. I would be.

Mr. HENDERSON. Will you vote for a proposition to that effect?

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, let it come before us.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will say just one word; I do not wish to make an argument on this question, for I suppose it is very well understood.

The Senator from Missouri seems to lecture me. I do not know but that I ought to be lectured, because I have occasion to lecture so many other people. [Laughter.] I am willing to take my chance in that direction. I believe that on the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Wilson] I did for the first time vote for an increase of the rates fixed by the committee. I did so because I thought they were not right, and I explained why they were not right, and because I thought it very hard that for ten days I should be compelled to sit here and vote for all the propositions which had been settled by the committee, in some cases against my vote, while other members of the committee exercised the right to vary from the report as they saw fit, though as a general rule they have stood by it; I thought it very hard if after the work I did upon it I might not be indulged in one thing.

In regard to what I said to my friend from Ohio [Mr. Sherman] last night, I will now admit that I spoke to him rather in a pet at the time, because I was a little annoyed; but I concede his right to do what he did. When a man has been obliged to sit here ten days on a stretch attending to a bill like this, as I have been, without a single moment's cessation, and obliged to meet all comers, it is not very wonderful that I should feel sometimes worried and annoyed. I should like to have others try it and see how they like it. But enough of that. I do not feel disposed to say any more on that subject. I have simply given an excuse for myself.

In regard to this particular thing, I put in steamers as well as sailing vessels: I had an amendment made to that effect. I thought I was authorized by the committee to offer it; but my friend from Ohio thought I was not, at any rate so far as he was concerned; and to settle the question I moved to strike out the words "or steam" from the section, stating at the time that I should vote myself to retain those words, my object in making the motion being merely to bring the question before the Senate. My friend from Ohio, who is from the West, explained the reasons why he thought it would not do to apply the section to steamers, and so satisfactorily to gentlemen that a large majority of the Senate voted to strike out those words against my vote and my opinion. I think that is a sufficient answer in relation to that point.

With regard to the thing itself, I can only say that after a great deal of deliberation, for several days at times, thinking it all over and looking upon it in every light, the committee were unanimous in agreeing that it ought to be done, because they thought, as the honorable Senator from Maryland has expressed it, that a commercial marine was of some consequence to the country; that it was of some consequence to the country to preserve the sea-going men; that it was of consequence to the country to preserve the art of ship-building to some extent, which has given us so much renown. The committee thought this was a great national interest, as much so as a factory or anything else, it being commerce, or rather navigation, a branch of commerce; and this seemed to be the only way in which navigation in its now declining condition could be protected.

We are particularly interested in my section of the country, because we live right alongside the British Provinces, where they build vessels at half of the rate we can; and so far as my State is concerned it is about the only thing in this bill in which it has any very considerable interest, and there are many other sections of the country that have also a large interest in it. I have stated the reason why it was put in, after careful deliberation, as I said before, by the unanimous consent of the committee, and I hope it will be retained by the Senate.

Mr. HENDERSON. I wish to call the attention of the Senator to one fact; that in this bill every stick of ship-timber that goes into the vessel is free, being put on the free list.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then there will be nothing to be returned for the timber.

Mr. HENDERSON. You get the timber free, and then you get a drawback upon all the other materials in the ship: upon the iron, the hemp, the cordage, the canvas, and every thing of that character.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We get it upon nothing that has gone into a state of manufacture. We get it on raw materials.

Mr. HENDERSON. You get all the timber free; but if we build a fence in the West we pay an increased price, because of the increased duty, if there is any thing in duties.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suppose every Senator understands the matter; and if the reasons for putting in the section are not sufficient they will vote down the section; otherwise they will retain it.

Mr. DAVIS. There is a large amount of steamboat tonnage built at Cincinnati, Louisville, and New Orleans. There is a large amount of foreign tonnage in the form of sailing ships built at Portland and other ports in the East and Northeast. Now, sir, I repeat the question of the Senator from Missouri: as there are many articles of foreign import upon which duties are paid that enter into the construction of both classes of vessels, how is it that this bill authorizes a drawback upon all the foreign articles that enter into the manufacture of sailing ships, and withholds it only from all the articles of foreign manufacture that enter into the construction of steamboats? The Senator from Maryland asks whether, even though it be unjust that there should be this discrimination, the fact of this drawback not being allowed upon the construction of western steamboats is a sufficient reason why it should not be allowed upon the construction of eastern sailing vessels. I say, sir, it is sufficient; I say that the system ought to be one of reciprocity; that there is no justice, there is no wisdom, there is no statesmanship in a system that makes such a discrimination, and when that discrimination is established it is a sufficient reason to me to vote against the whole system.

Why, sir, is any Senator here ready to vote for high protective duties in the form of taxes positively imposed or drawbacks allowed to a distant section of the United States when his section is wholly denied such privileges? Is that the mode in which he is to represent his people and the interests of his constituency in the legislation of the Senate? No, sir. I respond to no appeal that asks me to vote for any such class of legislation as that. I say that this system of protecting industry ought to be equal, reciprocal, just; and whenever the Senator from Maryland concedes or establishes that it becomes sectional, I am ready then and there to vote against the sectional system. Sir, I admit that I have not the broadness, the loftiness of statesmanship to vote to sustain any such system as that. When legislation becomes class and sectional and becomes limited to a few great and absorbing interests, and ceases to be general and just and universal in its features and spirit, then I declare my hostility to that legislation, and I manifest it by my word and by my votes. I agree with the Senator from Missouri that the measure under consideration is framed wholly upon this partial and sectional system, and therefore ought to be voted down. It ought not to be imposed upon the people of the United States; if it is, they ought to reject it; they ought to send men here who will reform it, and I have no doubt they will.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator misunderstood me when he says I represent the bill as having been originally framed on this idea. The bill was a much better bill when it came from the committee. It has been made infinitely worse by a combination of interests on this floor since.

Mr. DAVIS. I am speaking of the bill as it has come from the committee and as it has been modified by amendments accepted by the Senate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I shall vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri, but not exactly for the reason given by him or by the Senator from Kentucky. I shall vote to strike out this section because I think the system of drawbacks is in itself vicious and ought not to be adopted. For the purposes of revenue, as indicated by the advocates of this bill, it is thought proper to impose a tax upon iron, copper, cordage, &c., that are imported into the country. They are introduced; they come through our ports; they come into the hands of the merchants; they have paid their tax; and they stand with the price upon them in the markets of the country which the original cost, transportation, and taxes have fixed upon them. They are purchased by men who then propose to use them for the purpose of building ships. After the money has gone into the Treasury, because a man will use these articles in the building of ships he is allowed to go to the national Treasury and take the money out. It is simply, when reduced to a clear statement, an authority to a man who will build a ship to go to the Treasury and draw from the Treasury a certain amount of money. I say that system is vicious.

In the West the plowshare, the sunlight, and the rain bring to us our wealth; and when the farmer has paid two dollars more upon his plow because the material is taxed, can he go to the Treasury and demand that two dollars back? Is agriculture not as great an interest as commerce that it shall not be equally protected? The man who builds a ship can go to your Treasury and demand a certain sum of money because he has built a ship; but the man who makes and uses a plow has no such benefit from the legislation. I oppose the system, whether it be extended to sailing and steam vessels, or whether it be confined exclusively to sailing vessels. The thing is vicious; it is not equal; it is not just; it is simply paying out of the national Treasury men who will put their investment in a certain line and structure.

Mr. President, I am surprised to see the excitement of the Senator from Missouri upon this occasion. He becomes excited that the interests of one section are promoted at the expense of his section and mine. Ordinarily it is enough to arouse some degree of feeling; but does the Senator from Missouri not know that there are ten States of this Union that are not represented in this body—ten agricultural States, ten States that would stand by his State and my State if they were allowed to vote upon a question of this sort? I say until this Union is completely restored, until the agricultural labor of this country is fully represented, we may expect legislation like this; and until we have a full representation of all the interests of this country I do not look to equal legislation. I shall vote against this section, because I think it is a vicious system. I shall vote against the bill, because it is not equal and just in the burdens which it imposes upon the different systems of labor and the different pursuits of the people of the country.

Mr. FOWLER. I wish simply to state a few reasons why I cannot support this amendment. In the first place, I am in favor of the section as it stands, provided our interests are protected also. I do not see any good reason why the interest of the ship-builders should be protected at the East and those of the West should not be. I am in favor of extending this protection alike to both, and I should like it amended so as to give that protection. I cannot support exactly the measure of the Senator from Missouri, because I am in favor of extending protection to this class of interests; neither could I support a bill that would discriminate so improperly against other interests.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will say to the Senator there is nothing sectional about it. So far as steamers are concerned, we build steamers at the East as well as at the West. We build steamers all along the Atlantic line, large steamers and small. I was for including them all in the section; but the Senate decided, and not by eastern votes particularly, but on motion of the honorable Senator from Ohio, that it was not advisable to extend it to river-going steamers.

Mr. FOWLER. I do not wish to be understood as charging anything sectional.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The section covers all sailing vessels built anywhere in the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know whether I belong to the East or the West in this tremendous controversy that is pending here between the two sections of the country; but there is one consideration which has not been suggested that influences my judgment in favoring this section of the bill as it now stands. Objection is made because it is not applicable to steamboats built upon the Mississippi river, and it is claimed that it is a provision put into this bill for the exclusive benefit of Maine or some particular section of the country or New England.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to know if the Senator intends to put this language in my mouth, that I said it was for the benefit of Maine or any particular State?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator is aware that he did allude to Maine two or three times in the course of his remarks as particularly interested.

Mr. HENDERSON. I did. There are just as many vessels though built in the city of New York as in Maine, I apprehend, of late years. I alluded to Connecticut also, and to Maryland. I suppose there are a great many vessels built at Baltimore. I did allude to the western lakes, and stated that it was a discrimination against the Mississippi in favor of the St. Lawrence river.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not undertake to put any language in the mouth of the honorable Senator; but I say that it was a legitimate inference from his remarks that this provision was put into this bill for the benefit of Maine; and that is the way the honorable Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] understood it, and I presume it was so understood by most of the Senators. He may not have, in the excitement under which he seems to have labored, exactly measured the force of his language; but that was what I understood him to imply, if he did not expressly say it.

But, sir, I was about to remark that we can build ships upon the Pacific coast as well as they can in Maine, and that, so far as I can see, this provision is just as much for the advantage of California and Oregon as it is for Maine and Massachusetts, or any other part of the United States.

But the particular reason that influenced my mind in favoring this provision was this: there can be no foreign competition in the construction of steamboats; but I believe, unless there is some provision in this bill to promote the construction of sailing vessels in the United States, the entire business will be transferred to Europe, and there will not be a sailing vessel built in the United States. There is a necessity, it seems to me, on that account for protecting the business of ship-building in the United States; but there is no necessity for such protection so far as steamboats on the rivers are concerned, because none of those boats are built in Europe or can be constructed in Europe.

Mr. GRIMES. Will the Senator be kind enough to inform me what is the necessity for protecting the schooners and sloops on the lake coast?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will answer. It is impossible in any provision of law to particularize every vessel and every ship. The mass of the shipping protected by this provision is such as sails upon the ocean, as does the coasting trade; and it would be impossible, in making a provision of this kind, to specify that it should apply to ships sailing in one locality and not apply to ships sailing in another locality; but the provision is general, and its benefits are attained by vessels chiefly engaged in the coasting trade or in commerce with foreign countries. Such vessels are those the construction of which this provision is intended to benefit, though it may incidentally assist in the construction of vessels upon the lakes, and I am sure that no western man can complain of that. I suppose that if the construction of sailing vessels upon the lakes is made cheap it will cheapen transportation for the West, because they transport by way of the lakes their produce to the eastern market, and the cheaper the vessels are constructed upon the lakes the less will the cost of transportation be.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to ask the Senator if transportation to the East will not be much cheaper if we take off the entire duty on railroad iron and let us import it from England?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I presume so; I make no question about that; but it is necessary that some tariff should be imposed upon foreign iron to protect those who are engaged in the manufacture of iron in the United States, and that is the main reason, I presume, why a tariff is imposed upon the importation of foreign iron. But that is not a parallel case to the one now before the Senate. There is a certain business in the United States, the ship-building business, and the object of this bill is to protect as far as possible all kinds of business. It is necessary that this business should be protected, and this is the way in which the business can be protected; and it seems to me that it can be protected in no other way. The reason that this provision may very properly apply to sailing vessels and not to steamboats upon the rivers is, as I have stated, that there is a foreign competition as to the one, and there is none as to the other. That is one reason that influenced my mind; it may not be a sufficient reason to operate upon the minds of other Senators.

The idea that this is simply brought forward here by those who are interested in building up the interests of the East, for the purpose of oppressing the interests of the West, I regard as a very great mistake. I do not consider myself more identified with the interests of New England than I am with the interests of Iowa or Missouri; nor are the members of the committee. One of the members of the committee lives in the West; another lives in the South; another lives on the Pacific coast; and a majority of the members of that committee are men who are not interested in any way in New England any more than they are in any other State or portion of this country. I do not wish to express any opinion whatever; I do not presume to express any opinion as to the mode in which these matters shall be discussed; but I am very sorry to see so much apparent and, as I conceive, unnecessary hostility manifested here between what is called the East and the West. So far as I am individually concerned, I am just as much identified with one as the other, and the interests of the East and the interests of the West are equal in their importance to me, and I believe to my section of the country.

Mr. CATTELL. I concur in every word that has been said by the Senator from Oregon, and wish to say that this was the unanimous opinion of the committee. That is not very important, nor are their opinions in the view of the Senator from Missouri of very much weight; nevertheless, I desire to relieve the Senator from Maine from the apparent imputation that it may have proceeded from him. The committee were entirely unanimous on this subject. It was shown to the committee that a ship could be built in Nova Scotia at very nearly fifty per cent. less than it could be built in Maine. There was no possible way of protecting it that could be seen in accordance with our laws and treaty regulations, save by a drawback, and it was unanimously agreed that it was one of those interests worthy to be protected in the best form we could, and I believe the committee were entirely unanimous in the opinion that this drawback ought to be given.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to say once for all that if Senators understood me as imputing anything wrong to the Senator from Maine, they are very much mistaken. I have altogether a different opinion of that Senator. I apprehend that the Senator from Maine desired to protect the interests of his own State, as I desire to protect the interests of mine. I do not blame him for that. If I were to blame him for it I should blame materially the Senator who has just taken his seat. I apprehend that that Senator has on several occasions offered amendments proposing increased duties looking directly to the protection of the manufactures of his own State. I do not blame him for that, because it really seems to me that there has been a desire from the beginning among Senators to offer amendments looking to the protection of the interests of their own States. I do not think the Senator from Maine has been so eager about it as various other Senators. I only complained—and if I manifested any excitement about it it grew out of that fact—that when I offered amendments looking to the protection of the interests of my State, as I conceived, they were not regarded at all, but were cast aside coolly, and sometimes I thought rather contemptuously. The Senator from New Jersey, who has just taken his seat, I apprehend has had interests in his State protected over and above the duties proposed by the Committee on Finance in this bill as they reported it to the Senate.

If I do not mistake there is an interest protected in this bill to the extent of four dollars per ton upon the stone of New Jersey, and if I am not incorrectly informed upon the subject, really as good stone to build houses can be brought into the city of Portland for three dollars a ton, making a duty of more than one hundred per cent. I was surprised at the coolness with which the Senator from Maine accepted that proposition, or rather suffered it to pass.

There are other interests protected here that I might allude to; but the Senator will not understand that I blame him for looking to the interests of his own people. He was sent here for that purpose;—not to look after their interests alone. It is true, he is a Senator of the United States; but it is not to be expected that Senators will wholly disregard the interests of their own constituents. I have no complaint to make of it. I do not complain even of the Senator from Maryland, who looks to the protection of the shipping interest upon the waters of Maryland.

But, sir, the Senator from Oregon says that the shipping interest will die unless this protection is given. Why, sir, what was the effect of the lowest duties ever known in this country, those under the tariff of 1846, upon tonnage? In 1846 we had 188,208 tons of tonnage; in 1847, 243,732; in 1848, 318,000; in 1849, 256,000; in 1850, 272,000; in 1851, 298,000; in 1852, 357,000; in 1853, 425,000; in 1854, 535,000, and in 1856, 583,000 tons—a gradual, constant increase in the amount of tonnage built in this country, and yet we are told it cannot be built here now. If it could be built under the tariff of 1846, why can it not be built under the present rates without giving a drawback of every dollar that goes into it in iron, cordage, canvas, &c.? I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GRIMES. I desire to state, as the yeas and nays are about to be taken, that on this question the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Brown] has paired off with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. Creswell.] The Senator from Missouri wished me to say that if here he would vote in favor of the proposition, and the Senator from Maryland would vote against it.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 11, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Doolittle, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Lane, Patterson, Sherman, Trumbull, and Yates—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Cragin, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fogg, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Harris, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Kirkwood, McDougall, Morgan, Morrill, Poland, Ramsey, Sprague, Stewart, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—26.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Cowan, Creswell, Dixon, Fowler, Guthrie, Nesmith, Norton, Nye, Pomeroy, Riddle, Ross, Saulsbury, and Sumner—15.

So the motion to strike out did not prevail.

Mr. GRIMES. I have two or three amendments that I propose to offer. I do not expect, however, that the inexorable majority who are going to pass this bill will adopt them, but I want to give them an opportunity to do so. On page 91 I move to insert the words "and one half" after the word "cent" in the sixty-seventh line of the fifteenth section; so as to read:

On beef not cured, and on beef dried, one cent and one half per pound.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GRIMES. In the same line I move to strike out "two" and insert "three;" so as to read:

On beef cured in barrels, three dollars per barrel of two hundred pounds.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is none imported now. The amount, according to the tables, imported last year was thirty dollars' worth.

Mr. GRIMES. I am not so sure about that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I know it.

Mr. GRIMES. At any rate I do not know how that may be under this tariff. When they drive cattle down from Canada it may be for their interest to pack them there in consequence of the large imposition of duty on salt and saltpeter. If there are none imported, as the Senator says, it can do no harm. I think it is well enough to raise the rate a dollar a barrel.

Mr. SHERMAN. If there was any object in the world in levying a duty on meats of any kind I should be willing to vote for the amendment; but the whole amount brought into this country in 1865 of beef and pork was $921; of bacon and ham $3,150; of meats preserved in cans and sausages, $11,538. That shows that under the old tariff, when admitted duty free, there was no importation of meats into the country. This amendment, therefore, is simply useless.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GRIMES. It is pretty evident, I think, that the Senate are not disposed to interfere with the subject of meats. I will now try them on the subject of knowledge, in the absence of the Senator from Massachusetts. [Laughter.] I should not presume to poach on the manor of the Senator from Massachusetts when he was present. On page 88, line twenty-seven of section fourteen, I propose to reduce the duty on printing paper from twenty to fifteen per cent. ad valorem. On this question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will simply state that the present duty is twenty per cent., and has been so a number of years. It produces a large revenue.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 12, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Davis, Doolittle, Fogg, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Lane, McDougall, Patterson, Ramsey, Trumbull, and Yates—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Cragin, Edmunds, Fessenden, Foster, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Harris, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill, Poland, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—25.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Cowan, Creswell, Dixon, Guthrie, Kirkwood, Nesmith, Norton, Nye, Pomeroy, Riddle, Ross, Saulsbury, and Sumner—15.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GRIMES. On page 93 I move to strike out all on that page after line five of section sixteen down to the nineteenth line of that section, on page 94, on the subject of lumber. I am in favor of having free lumber, to develop the country, and I want a vote by yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 8, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Davis, Grimes, Henderson, Kirkwood, McDougall, Patterson, Trumbull, and Yates—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cattell, Conness, Cragin, Edmunds, Fessenden, Foster, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Harris, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill, Poland, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Wade, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—23.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Cowan, Creswell, Dixon, Doolittle, Fogg, Guthrie, Hendricks, Lane, Nesmith, Norton, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Riddle, Ross, Saulsbury, Sumner, and Van Winkle—21.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GRIMES. It is very evident, I think, that the Senate is looking very closely after revenue this evening; and I therefore propose to strike from the free list on page 105, line one hundred and sixty-eight of section eighteen, the words "ship timber." I ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 5, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, and Lane—5.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cattell, Conness, Cragin, Davis, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fogg, Foster, Fowler, Harris, Howard, Johnson, Kirkwood, McDougall, Morgan, Morrill, Patterson, Poland, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—30.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Cowan, Creswell, Dixon, Doolittle, Frelinghuysen, Guthrie, Nesmith, Norton, Nye, Pomeroy, Riddle, Ross, Saulsbury, and Sumner—17.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, it seems to me the votes indicate a purpose on the part of the Senate not to change this bill further, and I suggest to gentlemen it is just as well we should come to a vote on the bill. I cannot see any advantage in contesting it further.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have no amendment to offer except in reference to the day when this bill shall take effect, and that is in the third line of the first section, on page 1. I believe the blank that was originally left in that line has been filled up with the 1st day of April. If that be adhered to it is very plain what the operation will be. The Senate has made up its mind to pass the bill; it will go to the House of Representatives and be passed there, and become a law, and become a law soon. Then between that time and the 1st of April the large importers will bring immense quantities of goods into the country, and in that way the object of the bill, to some extent at least, will be defeated. I presume that during the interval between now and the 1st of April large importations will be made. There is a plenty of time to telegraph to Europe and have large stocks imported between now and the 1st of April; and the effect will be to neutralize, to a very considerable extent, one design of the bill. If it be protective let the benefit of the protection go to the manufacturers. If the object be merely to increase the revenue, perhaps it will increase the revenue in this way as much as in any other. Perhaps we shall get a much larger revenue in this way, for the simple reason that the importations will be at the present rates of duty, which are less than the proposed rates. I move to strike out the words "on and after the 1st day of April, 1867," and to insert some reasonable time, say the 15th or 20th day after the passage of the act.

Mr. WILSON and others. Make it take effect from the passage of the act.

Mr. HENDERSON. Perhaps fifteen or twenty days will be too long a time, for within that time stocks of goods could be ordered by telegraph and imported. I would propose that it shall take effect on the tenth day after the passage of the act.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is rather a loose form of expression; you might just as well say from and after the passage of the act.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have no objection to that, and I move to amend by striking out "on and after the 1st day of April, 1867," and insert "from and after the passage of this act."

Mr. CATTELL. I concur in the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, and am very glad to do so.

Mr. HENDERSON. Thank you, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am very glad, Mr. President, that my friend from Missouri has proposed one amendment which shows a sincere friendship to the interest of the bill, to the interest of the country, for with the telegraph as it is now anybody who has capital can flood the country with goods of every description by the 1st of April. I hope every friend of the bill will agree with the Senator from Missouri in going for this amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest now, that amendment having been agreed to by the Senate, that the same change should be made in the proviso on the fifth page, by striking out the words "after the 1st day of April, 1867," and inserting "after the passage of this act."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That change will be made as a matter of course, to make the bill consistent with itself.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then in the twenty-sixth section, the section repealing prior inconsistent acts, the same change should be made.

Mr. JOHNSON. Let me suggest that the words "are hereby repealed" will answer the purpose, and are preferable to the words "shall from and after the passage of this act be repealed."

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, those words will do as well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That change of phraseology will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. STEWART. In voting for the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] in regard to the duty on woolen cloths, I believed that the class valued at less than one dollar a pound would include all the coarser articles used by the poor people generally, and that the effect of the amendment would be to increase the duty upon the finer cloths; but from the best information I can get the dollar limit in the amendment should be raised to a dollar and a half.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think it is right as it stands.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have made inquiry since this question was up before, and I do not believe that a single pound of clothing such as is used by the common laborers, excepting the coarser satinetts, which are mixed with cotton, will fall in the category under a dollar a pound.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The provision can be corrected in the House if it is wrong.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the amendment is a violation of the agreement between the wool-growers and manufacturers, and will be a disturbing element.

Mr. WILSON. I think the Senator ought to know that that has been violated in several places.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think so.

Mr. STEWART. I move a reconsideration of the vote adopting that amendment, so that we may have an opportunity to correct it.

Mr. SHERMAN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 20, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Doolittle, Fogg, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane, McDougall, Patterson, Ramsey, Sherman, Stewart, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, and Yates—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Cragin, Edmunds, Fessenden, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Harris, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill, Poland, Sprague, Wade, Williams, and Wilson—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Cowan, Creswell, Dixon, Fowler, Guthrie, Nesmith, Norton, Nye, Pomeroy, Riddle, Ross, Saulsbury, and Sumner—15.

So the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I know nothing more unjust than I think this whole proposition. We have had to-night very earnest speeches made about the benefits of the East in this bill. I want simply—

Mr. SHERMAN. In order to shorten this matter—

Mr. WILSON. I have got the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. I want to submit a proposition.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to make one proposition. I move to amend the bill by striking out "forty-five" and inserting "fifty" in the eleventh line of the fourth section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment having been reconsidered, the question before the Senate is what will be stated at the desk. The question now is upon the amendment as moved. It will be read.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to put this question to the Senator from Ohio. Would you not be willing to put all under $1 50 in the first class, and then from $1 50 and two dollars in the second class, and all over two dollars to be a third class?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senate committee reduced the specific duty from fifty to forty-five cents, on the ground that we had thrown off the duties on drugs and chemicals, &c. Now, I am willing to vote for the proposition of the Senate to bring it back to fifty cents, in which they agreed, and not make any difference of classification.

Mr. WILSON. I think you will get more revenue from the proposition in the way I have got it, and it will come heavier on the finer articles.

Mr. STEWART. I think there ought to be a discrimination, and I like that better.

Mr. WILSON. I will modify my amendment so as to provide that the duty on all cloths under one dollar and a half shall stand as it does in the bill; those between one dollar and a half and two dollars shall have a duty of fifty cents a pound, and forty per cent. ad valorem, and all above two dollars a pound fifty cents and forty-five per cent.

Mr. GRIMES. What about that agreement?

Mr. WILSON. I do not care about the agreement. We are sent here to legislate, and not the woolen manufacturers or wool-growers.

Mr. SHERMAN. I admit that we are not bound by the agreement; but there is this to be said: the wool manufacturers, in a convention of their own calling, agreed that all they wanted was fifty cents a pound and thirty-five per cent. ad valorem. They agreed upon that basis when they were taxed on all the chemicals used by them, when they were taxed a larger rate on the wool, when it was proposed to tax a certain portion of the wool a larger amount than we have put on it. I am willing to give them all they claim; and yet by our previous action we have given them a benefit of at least five per cent. on their whole production. Let me say further, that any deviation from the agreement will give grave ground for complaint. It has already been started, and grave objection will be made, not against us particularly, but among these men who are rivals in interest and rivals in trade, whose interests have been antagonistic. One class will say they made a fair bargain with the other, but they did not live up to it. We ought to have no controversy of that kind upon a matter of this sort. I am perfectly willing to take their own arrangement in the very words they made it, give them the benefit of it, and abide by it. I think they ought to be satisfied with that.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I do not exactly understand—perhaps it is owing to my ignorance—what is meant by the agreement of the various interests which is here spoken of. Is it a combination of persons to affect legislation?

Mr. WILSON. I desire to modify my amendment, if I have the power to do so, in the manner I have suggested.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It may be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. WILSON. Instead of the classifications proposed originally I wish to make them $1 50, two dollars, and above two dollars.

Mr. SHERMAN. On the complaint of one man, who has been bothering us and hectoring us for nearly a month for his own particular interest, we are to violate an arrangement made by a convention representing both the wool-growers and wool manufacturers.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator will pardon me for saying that some of the largest manufacturers in the country, the largest men engaged in manufacturing, are in favor of something such as I propose being done; and further, they believe that this bill as it stands is destructive to two thirds of the woolen manufacturing interests of the country, and that they have got to suffer for it, because here is an absolute reduction from the law as it stands; certainly it is. The old law is worth more to us by seven per cent. than this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment as now proposed will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was in section four, line eleven, to strike out all after the word "specified" to the end of the clause, and insert:

Valued at $1 50 or less per pound, forty-five cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem; valued at over $1 50 and less than two dollars per pound, fifty cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, forty per cent. ad valorem; valued at two dollars and over per pound, fifty cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, forty-five per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. HOWARD. I desire to ascertain whether I understood the Senator from Ohio correctly in reference to the duties upon cloths. I understood him to say that the bill which is now before us, that is to say, the report of the Committee on Finance, contains in this respect substantially the result of an honorable agreement and understanding between the wool-growers on the one side and the woolen manufacturers on the other. Do I understand him correctly?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; but the Committee on Finance did reduce the specific rate from fifty to forty-five cents, on the ground after we had put chemicals and dye-stuffs on the free list, equivalent, according to their own declaration, to two and a half cents a pound, and also reduced the rate of duty on flocks, a portion of the wool used in the finer broadcloth, giving an advantage perhaps sufficient to make up the difference; but I said rather than have the matter opened again I would be willing to see the duty restored to fifty cents specific, instead of having these discriminating duties that in one case would raise the duty ten per cent. ad valorem and five cents per pound, and in the other case five per cent. ad valorem and five cents a pound. A duty of ten per cent. ad valorem on some cloths might amount to fifty cents or a dollar a yard on fine French broadcloths.

Mr. HOWARD. So in effect the committee carried out the agreement made between these parties as accurately and equitably as they were able to do.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the fact.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope, then, there will be no alteration made in the report of the committee, and that the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts will not be accepted. Let us try the experiment according to the agreement made between these two rival interests and stand by the agreement which they have made ourselves. I feel bound by that arrangement.

Mr. McDUGALL. I do not understand how agreements can be made in committee, and how agreements can be made in conventions between wool-growers' interests and manufacturers' interests, that come here to control the legislation of the Senate. I protest against anything of the kind. I say such agreements tend to public mischief. How am I to be governed by the report of a committee except as I am advised by it? A committee is a mere body of inquiry to ascertain facts and advise the Senate. Wool-growers and wool-manufacturers may go before them and endeavor to promote their own interests; but what right have they to commit the Senate to any such thing, or to make or indorse any compact of the kind? I object to it as being against the philosophy of true legislation here.

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes 17, noes 18.

Mr. WILSON. I call for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I should be much obliged if the Senator from Ohio would explain the difference between the committee's report and the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts; I do not understand it very clearly.

Mr. SHERMAN. The committee proposed upon woolen cloths, shawls, &c., a duty of forty-five cents per pound and thirty-five per cent. ad valorem. The Senator from Massachusetts proposes a duty of forty-five cents per pound and thirty-five per cent. ad valorem on all worth $1 50 per pound and less; and fifty cents per pound and forty per cent. ad valorem on all between $1 50 and two dollars; and fifty cents a pound and forty-five per cent. ad valorem on all above two dollars a pound. That is it I believe.

Mr. GRIMES. I am in a difficulty to determine what I ought to do in this matter. I do not want to be put in the condition of voting for an increase of the duty on wooleens, and yet I would like to do something for the assistance of the man who I understand would be benefited by the adoption of this amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts. I understand that there was one large woolen manufacturer in New England who had honesty, manliness, and high sense of principle sufficient to cause him to abstain entirely from all coöperation or participation in this combination of the woolen manufacturers for the purpose of coercing Congress into the passage of this bill, and I suppose it to be true from what I have heard that this man has been in consequence read out of the circle. They have put him, in a degree, under the ban, because of his manliness and independence; and there is not that protection given to him, he producing the best qualities of broadcloths, that is given to other woolen manufacturers. This is information I got long before to-night. I understand from those on whom I rely that that is just about the condition of things: that one gentleman in Massachusetts, whose father was the man who originally introduced the manufacture of cotton cloths in this country and carried them up to the highest production in point of quality that there has ever been thrown upon our market from the American looms, in conjunction with one other person, a citizen of the State of Maine, are the only parties who will be specially advanced by the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts. So far as they are concerned I would like to reach them; that is to say, I do not want to do anything that would interfere with or militate against their interest, because I want to reward them for the public spirit and candor and manliness that were exhibited in remaining out of this combination that has attempted to control the action of Congress in legislation upon great public questions.

Mr. SHERMAN. A word in regard to this matter. Mr. Slater is the gentleman referred to. I have nothing to say in regard to him except this: he wanted to get wool and everything else that he bought admitted duty free; he wanted to buy everything he had to buy as low as possible in the cheapest market in the world. That he frankly admitted was his policy. Then he wanted as high a duty on the article he manufactured as he could possibly get out of Congress. If this is an evidence of the highest patriotism I am mistaken. The people of Iowa and Ohio, so far as I have heard them ask for anything, simply ask that the same protection which is given to other productions of American laborers shall be extended to the article of wool. I do not know a citizen of the State of Ohio who does not ask this and demand it, not as a matter of favor, but a matter of right; and, as I said before, the very moment you show the agriculturists of this country that under similar circumstances you are not willing to give to the production of their industry the same reasonable protection by your tariff laws that you do to all other industry, that moment they will use their power to break down the whole system, and in that I would defend them, because wool is the result of labor, and if they are not entitled to a reasonable protection against the labor of Canada and the labor of South America in the production of wool the whole system is vicious and ought to be abolished, and the sooner the better. Simply because Mr. Slater would not go into a convention which recommended a duty to protect the growth of wool in this country, he is therefore said to be a patriotic and high-minded admirable citizen, and is highly extolled. The simple fact is, that he wanted to get his wool duty free and everything that he has to buy free.

Mr. GRIMES. What evidence has the Senator for that?

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Slater frankly admits that he is in favor of free wool.

Mr. GRIMES. Did he so inform the committee?

Mr. SHERMAN. I so understood; he was in favor of the principle of free wool.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I confess I do not remember it.

Mr. SHERMAN. He is opposed to the increase of duty on wool.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What I understood him to say was that he believed the best thing for the wool-growers, as well as for the wool manufacturers, was that manufactures should be protected and built up, for as they were established in this country wool-growing would necessarily prosper. That was his idea. He said that was the best thing for the wool-growers in his judgment, and the only way in which what was desired could be effectually accomplished. With regard to this arrangement he said that in his judgment the tariff as it stood was better.

Mr. SHERMAN. And he went on to extol in the highest terms the tariff of 1857, which admitted wool free of all duty. He thought that the most admirable system that could be devised, because it enabled him to buy his article without any tariff duty.

Mr. GRIMES. And wool was higher under it than it has been at other times except during the war.

Mr. SHERMAN. While Senators here are complaining about the duty on wool, it may be said that there is no other article of production in the United States of America the price of which this day in currency is no higher than the price before the war in gold. That is the case in regard to wool, and it is simply because it is without reasonable protection, having a duty of only four, and a half cents a pound. If there is not a disposition on the part of the manufacturer to give to the wool-grower the same principle of protection that is applied to his own labor, I would not vote for a tariff bill. The wool-grower must be without any benefit of the principle of protection until the manufacture is so well established, according to Mr. Slater's idea, as to be able to consume all the wool of this country mixed with what he can buy cheaper abroad. While that point is being reached all our flocks and herds would be gone, turned into tallow, and as a matter of course during the process all our sheep would be used up.

Mr. WILSON. I object to turning this whole debate upon Mr. Slater. Mr. Slater is an eminent manufacturer. He has probably a large interest in the manufacturing business, but he is not alone; two thirds of all the woolen interests of this country are involved in this clause of the bill. I have received letters from three others recently, very large manufacturers, eminent men, and I will say to you what they believe; and they are not alone in it. They believe that the passage of this bill will not be for the benefit of the manufacturing interest of the country. They prefer the laws as they now exist. But if this change is made then they ought not to be reduced as they are. The distinction is this—and I want the Senator from Indiana to understand just what it means—all goods valued at less than $1 50, which comprise nearly all the cloths that make up the dresses of the great mass of the people, especially of the laboring men of the country, will be left just as they are in the bill, forty-five cents a pound and thirty-five per cent. ad valorem; all above $1 50 and less than two dollars, which embrace the finer articles, I propose to increase; and those above two dollars, which will take the more fine and costly broadcloths, will pay more, and they ought to pay in proportion. I believe it is sound and right in principle, and ought to be adopted. And I will say that in many of those cheaper articles the proportion of labor is only about twenty per cent., while in the more costly articles it is from forty-five to fifty per cent. I speak of labor and machinery included.

Mr. HOWE. I want to say a single word, because I believe I have got to vote differently from the way my friends from my section of the country are generally going to vote. I am not going to vote with any reference to the interests of Mr. Slater at all, nor with any special reference to the interests of manufacturers. I am going to vote, as I have tried to vote all through this struggle, for the interests of the agricultural class. The only way we can protect the wool-growers, it seems to me, is by fixing duties so high as that they can raise wool here cheaper than wool can be imported. When that point is reached the wool-grower, it seems to me, is satisfied. I suppose they have fixed that rate of duty in this bill, because I understand the bill fixes it at the rate agreed upon by the wool-growers themselves. Now, it seems to me the wool-grower has, then, the same interest in maintaining the manufacture of wool on this continent that he has in maintaining the growth of it, because who ever imports a yard of cloth competes with the wool-grower just as much as the man who imports four pounds of wool, for I understand there are four pounds of wool in a yard of cloth. If it be true, then, that the increase of duty asked for by the Senator from Massachusetts is essential to maintain the manufacture of wool here, it is for the interest of the wool-grower that the manufacturer should have that protection, for we certainly cannot hope to raise wool to export, and unless we can have manufactures to work it up, I take it, our farmers will abandon the business of growing wool. I may be mistaken in this sort of reasoning, but it does seem to me that this duty is just as essential to the wool-grower as the duty on wool itself.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 19, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cattell, Conness, Cragin, Edmunds, Fessenden, Foster, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Harris, Howe, Morgan, Morrill, Poland, Sprague, Stewart, Van Winkle, Wade, Williams, and Wilson—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Fogg, Grimes, Hendricks, Howard, Johnson, Kirkwood, Lane, Patterson, Ramsey, Sherman, Trumbull, Willey, and Yates—15.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Cowan, Cresswell, Dixon, Doolittle, Guthrie, Henderson, McDougall, Nesmith, Norton, Nye, Pomeroy, Riddle, Ross, Saulsbury, and Sumner—18.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I ask for a vote now on horseshoe nails. I desire to amend the motion I made before in this respect. I asked for seven cents instead of five. The present duty is five cents by the existing tariff. The increase of duty on iron is three fourths. I now ask for six cents. I move on page 31, line one hundred and fifty-three, to strike out "five" and insert "six;" so as to read:

On horseshoe nails, all kinds, six cents per pound. The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I think there is one amendment I proposed this evening that ought to prevail. It is on page 8, section one, in reference to cotton goods. The committee have reduced the duties upon cotton goods twenty per cent.; that is, where it was five they have placed it four. The commissioner informs me this morning that the authority by which the reduction was made has informed him by letter that, in consequence of the increased duty upon every thing that enters into the manufacture of cotton cloth, the present duty should be reinstated. I trust the committee will agree to that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am not satisfied. I saw the letter. It was one that I did not attach any consequence to.

Mr. SPRAGUE. The committee have reduced the duties on cotton goods twenty per cent. I have statements to show to the Senate, but I will not take up their time, that the protection upon the goods that are represented by this class is one and three eighths cents only, and I can prove it to the satisfaction of anybody. There is no agreement between the cotton manufacturers and cotton producers. [Laughter.] The iron and the starch and the castings and the steel have all been increased, and all those items enter into the production of a piece of cotton cloth. I will mention the article of potato starch. The duty fixed by the committee is four and a half cents; the old duty was two and a half cents. It is so in everything, except cotton, that enters into the production of cotton cloth; and notwithstanding that, the duties have been decreased. Mr. Commissioner Wells says that the authority upon which this reduction was made has informed him that the present duty ought to be replaced. There is no mistake about it: it is a self-evident proposition.

Mr. McDUGALL. It is so long since I learned my first mathematics that I have almost forgotten what is positive, and I am not a great master of figures. What the gentleman says may be very true; he understands the computation of numbers and must have been a great student of all forms of mechanics from his youth upward. He knows how every thing can be produced that can be produced by art and science. Very well; I do not accept his judgment as compelling mine, for, thinking severely, I happen to think that my mathematics is even superior to his own. This may be called a boast, and it may be a boast, but still it is the simple truth.

Now, sir, as I am on the floor, I wish to say a few words before we reach the final vote. I shall vote for this measure when it is matured by the chairman of the Finance Committee, for whom I have great respect, as he knows, although the principles involved in it are not such as to meet with my full concurrence.

I shall have to go back many years to explain the reason why I shall thus vote. There was an occasion when a man whom I remember as one of the most distinguished men of our Republic, having argued many times against a certain course of policy, yet voted for it because it was demanded by the interests of the Republic. I speak of Silas Wright. I shall support this bill, although I object, not to the measure as it stands, but to its underlying considerations. The trouble is not the tariff; the trouble is our financial condition, and the way it has been organized.

We have to raise large amounts of money. We have to impose upon the people taxation sufficient to raise revenue enough to support the Government. It is caused much by the way our finances have been organized, and in this remark I have no reference to the Finance Committee, but to the policy organized at the opening of the war—to the organization of the national banks, to the system that undertook to make that a dollar which is not a dollar. The consequence is, that when a laborer asks for his daily wages, instead of two dollars a day, which was formerly sufficient, he asks five dollars, and he cannot get it because of the confusion of the currency.

We have to-day in this country about five times as much currency as is justified by a proper and sound business, and therefore we have to pay high taxes. The taxes must be paid; the Government must be supported; but the error is in the basis of our system. We have at the center of the Government a power gravitating throughout the whole Republic. I suppose that our five hundred banks, with a license from this capital to transact business, are all inviting the honest trader to borrow $50, $500, $5,000, it being profitable to the institution with which he deals.

That requires a condition of affairs that disables us from having steady exchange abroad and transacting with advantage our business with foreign nations. That is the reason why we must have this tariff to which I submit only as a political necessity. It is wrong, in my judgment, not as presently presented, but wrong because wise policy did not lie at the foundation of the organization of the system. I think that in its organization the great interests of the Republic were not highly regarded, and that great ambitions had much to do with it, as great ambitions had when Cæsar went consul into Spain. What for him? To redeem his own personal fortunes, and then come back pro-consul to be received through the gates of Rome triumphant. I do not say that this is the truth; but I do fear that it is the truth, and that fear sometimes makes me tremble for a Republic instituted by the wise men of our age which they designed to last through many centuries, but which now, not yet having passed a century, is threatened with utter dissolution. The underlying evil I think is in the financial policy of the Government; but our necessities must be met.

I do not undertake to speak as a very thoroughly-informed man; but as well as I have been able to think, and now presently, as well as I am able to speak, I say this evil must be corrected in our financial system generally throughout the Republic to enable us to maintain our institutions with half our present expenses, and then we shall not be compelled to demoralize ten thousand men regularly. The ten thousand men of whom I speak are the agents, accessories, and employes of the institutions that grow out of the banking system started here. I am somewhat responsible for what I call this iniquity, and I have long desired the time when I might state, and make public record of the fact, that I think I did a great wrong when I went for the bill which first established this currency. I thought it a public necessity at that moment, and I voted for the first bill that made paper money a legal tender. It was then said by the chairman of the Committee on Finance and by the Secretary of the Treasury that $100,000,000 would be sufficient. I submitted to that as a then present necessity. It has now grown into Gorgoneared Briareus hands, and Argus eyes, stretching around this our Republic and injurious to its health. When General Jackson feared a combination of $30,000,000 of capital, he had, by his brave constitution and his great will, the power to check an institution that threatened to demoralize our system at that time; but there was comparatively little danger then to what there is now, when $700,000,000 are afloat and being used in the same manner and for the same purpose.

I say these things, not as arguments against the bill, for I have already indicated that I shall vote for it, but I say them to give full expression to what I believe to be the truth, and what I should like to express as the truth. I desire not only those who are now present here, but others to hear what I think to be the truth.

Mr. SPRAGUE. The question before the Senate is to place the duties on cotton goods the same as they are at present, not to increase them. The proposition of the committee is to decrease them. My proposition is to permit them to remain as at present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There has been no amendment submitted.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I made a motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Rhode Island state his motion?

Mr. SPRAGUE. My motion is, on page 8, line fourteen of section two, to strike out "four" and insert "five;" in line fifteen to strike out "four and one half" and insert "five and one half;" in line sixteen to strike out "four and one half" and insert "five and one half." Those are the figures in the present tariff bill.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I offer the following amendment to come in at the end of the bill?

It shall be lawful to import into the United States any goods not prohibited, and to warehouse such as are subject to duties of customs in duly approved warehouses without payment of duties on their first entry; but the duties on goods imported from Great Britain or from Europe shall be paid on importation.

The object of that is to offset a similar law now on the statute-books of Great Britain, and I will read it. It will be all I shall say upon the subject. The law is as follows:

"It shall be lawful to import into the United Kingdom any goods not prohibited, and to warehouse such as are subject to duties of customs in duly approved warehouses without payment of duty on their first entry; but the duties on the following goods shall be paid on importation: on corn, grain, meal, flour, wood goods."

Every article which this country can furnish is subject to this restriction.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is changing the warehouse system as at present established. I hope it will not be voted at this time of night.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS. I rise merely to ask the Senate to decide upon an amendment which I offered a day or two since in relation to hemp. I ask the Clerk to read it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not aware of any pending amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. I presented it some days ago for the consideration of the Senate, but neglected to ask for the yeas and nays. I offered it in Committee of the Whole but not in the Senate. On page 22, line ten of section six, I move to strike out "twenty-five" and to insert "fifty."

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator tried that in the Senate. It was after we took the bill out of committee. I told him he could offer it after we got into the Senate. He agreed to it. When we got into the Senate it was tried and rejected.

Mr. HENDERSON. No; he withdrew it. There was no vote.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then I was mistaken.

Mr. DAVIS. I grouped several amendments together. I move now to strike out "twenty-five" in line ten and to insert "fifty."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal shows that the amendment was moved after the bill was reported to the Senate and a vote taken upon it, declaring it not to be agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That was my recollection. If it was rejected it cannot be moved again.

Mr. DAVIS. If that is the state of the case I have nothing more to say.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am satisfied the record is wrong.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is right. It is exactly according to my recollection.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not make this statement for the purpose of affecting the vote, because the amendment would be voted down if presented; but the Senator from Kentucky, instead of pressing a vote upon his amendment, withdrew it, and made a motion to recommit the bill. That is the state of the case.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No; we took a vote on it, but he did not call for a division.

Mr. HENDERSON. I stated merely what my recollection is. The Senator from Kentucky made no such proposition as this is in the first place. He moved to amend in various lines, not upon this point alone, but upon various others, and hence this amendment is now in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole as it has been amended.

Mr. GRIMES. Upon one question that was submitted to the Senate the other day upon which there was a vote, I am pretty well satisfied on more mature reflection that I cast an injudicious vote, and I should like to correct it. I refer to the vote adopting the amendment of the Senator from Michigan in regard to scrap iron. I move to reconsider that vote.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope that will not be done.

Several SENATORS. We will vote it down.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senate will vote it down I shall not inflict a speech upon them.

The motion to reconsider was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole as it has been amended.

The amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

Mr. HENDERSON. On page 21, line twenty of section five, I move to strike out "sixty" and insert "seventy."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not in order. The amendment made as in Committee of the Whole has been amended, and as amended has been concurred in. It is not now susceptible of amendment.

Mr. HENDERSON. Is not the bill susceptible of amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment, as amended, is not. New sections can be added; but the text of the amendment, as amended, having been agreed to in the Senate, is not now amendable.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read a third time.

Mr. HENDRICKS. On the passage of the bill I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GRIMES, (when Mr. BROWN's name was called.) I have received a message from the Senator from Missouri, telling me that he is confined to his room by sickness, and desiring me to announce when his name was called that if he were here he would vote against the passage of the bill.

Mr. BUCKALEW, (when his name was called.) I have paired off upon this question with the Senator from Maryland who is absent, [Mr. CRESWELL.]

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Cragin, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fogg, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Harris, Howard, Howe, Johnson, McDougall, Morgan, Morrill, Poland, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Davis, Doolittle, Fowler, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Kirkwood, Lane, Patterson, and Trumbull—10.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Cowan, Creswell, Dixon, Guthrie, Nesmith, Norton, Nye, Pomeroy, Riddle, Ross, Saulsbury, and Sumner—15.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at twenty-eight minutes past twelve o'clock,) adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 1, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

Mr. PATTERSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to receive into the Treasury the residuary legacy of James Smithson, to authorize the Regents of the Smithsonian Institution to apply the income of the said legacy, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

The bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to receive into the Treasury, on the same terms as the original bequest, the residuary legacy of James Smithson, now in United States bonds in the hands of said Secretary, namely, $26,210 63, together with such other sums as the Regents may from time to time see fit to deposit, not exceeding, with the original bequest, the sum of $1,000,000. It further provides that the income which has accrued, or which may hereafter accrue, from said residuary legacy shall be applied by the Board of Regents in the same manner as the interest on the original bequest, in accordance with the provisions of the act of August 10, 1846, establishing said Institution.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PATTERSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN A. WEBSTER.

Mr. ELIOT, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a joint resolution to permit John A. Webster, jr., of the steamer Mahoning, to receive from the Government of Great Britain a gold chronometer; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution provides that John A. Webster, jr., of the revenue-cutter service, captain of the steamer Mahoning, shall be permitted to receive from the Government of Great Britain a gold chronometer which that Government is desirous to award to him in token of its appreciation of valuable services rendered by Captain Webster to several British vessels in distress on our coast.

Mr. ELIOT. I have a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury on this subject, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 29, 1867.

SIR: Her Britannic Majesty's minister at Washington, Sir Frederick W. A. Bruce, having communicated to the Department of State the fact that the Government of Great Britain desires to award to Captain John A. Webster, jr., of the revenue steamer Mahoning, a chronometer for valuable services rendered by him to several British vessels in distress on the coast; that Department has communicated to this Department the request of Sir Frederick that an application be made by Congress for permission to enable Captain Webster to accept such testimonial, in conformity with the intentions of the British Government.

I have, therefore, the honor to submit the subject to the consideration of the Committee on Commerce for such action on the part of Congress as will give Captain Webster, a highly meritorious officer, authority to receive the testimonial referred to.

I am, very respectfully,

HUGH McCULLOCH,

Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. T. D. ELIOT, Acting Chairman of the Committee on Commerce, House of Representatives.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LEFTWICH moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PENTWATER AND PIERRE MARQUETTE.

Mr. FERRY, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to transmit to this House the reports and estimates prepared under the surveys of the past year for the improvement of the harbors of Pentwater and Pierre Marquette, on Lake Michigan.

SALES OF CONFISCATED COPPER STILLS.

Mr. DARLING, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the internal revenue laws as to require the destruction of all copper stills which may be confiscated to the United States, and the sale of the same as old copper only.

ENROLLED BILL AND RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 819) for the relief of Richard A. Vervalen and others; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 126) for the relief of certain settlers on the Sioux reservation, in the State of Minnesota.

PRESIDENTIAL PROCLAMATIONS.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. When House bill No. 859, to declare valid and conclusive certain proclamations of the President and acts done in pursuance thereof, &c., was recommended to the Committee on the Judiciary, some days ago, leave was granted to that committee to report it back at any time on giving one day's notice. I desire to state now, in order that it may go before the House as a notice, that I will upon Monday, after the morning hour, report that bill back from the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that there are now before the House two bills which committees have been authorized to report at any time, and they will have to be disposed of before any other business can come before the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 218) exempting the property of debtors in the District of Columbia from levy, attachment, or sale on execution; and

An act (S. No. 479) to punish illegal voting in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HALE. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. When the House adjourned on yesterday the tenure-of-office bill was under consideration; but to-day being private bill day, the consideration of that bill is suspended, unless the House shall otherwise order.

Mr. HALE. Will the tenure-of-office bill come up for consideration after the expiration of the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. It will, subject of course to the order of the House.

Mr. HALE. I must insist upon my call for the regular order.

HEIRS OF THOMAS W. HARVEY.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has now commenced, and the House resumes the consideration of the bill pending at the expiration of the morning hour on last private bill day, being House bill No. 1060, extending certain letters-patent for the benefit of the heirs of Thomas W. Harvey.

The bill and accompanying report were again read.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. BROMWELL. The reasons which induced the committee to recommend the extension of these patents are briefly set forth in the report which has just been read. I may say, in addition to the facts therein set forth, that this matter has been, and must necessarily have been, known to all parties who take any interest in the extension of these patents about a year. During all that time the facts set forth in that report, so far as Thomas W. Harvey was concerned, his time spent, his labors, and his ingenuity are uncontradicted by any one.

So far as I know, the only objection which is urged by any one to the extension of these patents is that such extension will conflict with the interests of somebody else; that some one else would do a little better if those patents are not extended. I will state what I understand, from all the information derived by the committee, is the present condition of these patents. The patents embraced in this bill are by no means the only patents under which this class of screws is produced. There are but two patents embraced in this bill, while the patents invented by Harvey alone were perhaps not less than a dozen. Besides those patents there are a great many other patented machines which are now in use. Beside the machines now sought to be protected by this bill, Mr. Harvey invented machines of which the public has already had the benefit during a great many years. By means of the machines invented by Mr. Harvey the cost of making these screws has been reduced, so far as the labor upon them is concerned, according to the sworn testimony before the committee, not less than eighteen dollars per thousand gross. According to the testimony, there are consumed in the United States not less than twelve hundred gross of these screws per day.

Now, so far as the public is concerned, it has already received immense advantages from the inventions of Mr. Harvey. And, more than this, it is proper to remark that but for the perseverance and patience and expenditure of money which Mr. Harvey put forth the probability is that the public never would have had any of this machinery, but these screws would to-day be made by the old-fashioned machinery.

Now, I desire to draw a distinction between this case and that class of cases in which a man, by some lucky thought, has invented a machine which is valuable. In the case before the House it is evident, from an examination of the machinery, that it never could have been produced in any other way than by continual repetition of experiment and the expenditure of large sums of money.

All of this machinery is what among manufacturers is called automatic; it performs its evolutions almost with a life-like action. The metal is drawn into wire, which is cut off into pieces, which are seized by fingers and carried to the several parts of the machinery, and there the various operations necessary to complete the screw are performed. Now, whatever monopoly there is in the business of manufacturing screws arises from the fact that no man or set of men can enter upon that manufacture without a very large capital, because somewhere about four hundred machines are necessary before a man is in position to manufacture articles to fill the commonest order.

These machines being complicated and costly, and the tools and implements with which they are made being also complicated and costly, it follows that whoever expends the vast sum of money necessary to put up and stock a factory may for that reason have a monopoly to a certain extent.

But the case here is not that of those holding a monopoly asking an extension. This is the case of the widow and heirs of the man by whose ingenuity and the expenditure of whose fortune the public now enjoy the advantage of having this machinery in operation in the country. It is in evidence that Mr. Harvey had a large estate, all of which he spent during a long series of years in the many experiments necessary to perfect this machinery. He received from the use of these patents nothing which was not itself spent in carrying out his experiments. He died. His widow and heirs have received nothing, and under present circumstances they can receive nothing. These two patents which he procured are of value; and if this extension be granted in the name of the widow and heirs, and no one else, some of those engaged in the manufacture of screws may perhaps pay this widow and these orphans something for the use of these machines. Although there are many other machines doing the same work, yet it is most likely that there is a certain value about these machines the profit of which might inure to the family of the inventor.

Now, what answer to this is it to say that the public have such an interest in these machines being thrown open that they cannot afford the simple act of justice proposed in this bill? The public never originated these inventions; the public never would have enjoyed them had no man been found with the ingenuity and patience and liberality to make the unnumbered experiments which resulted in the perfection of this automatic machinery. The public are called on to pay nothing. It is not proposed to take any money from the national Treasury; but inasmuch as a great boon has been conferred upon the public by the ingenuity and perseverance of Thomas W. Harvey, it is now simply proposed that, in accordance with the liberal spirit of American law and the usages of the Government from the beginning, the public shall, as they ought to, grant to the widow and heirs of this inventor the opportunity of obtaining some reasonable compensation for his invention, as they have heretofore had none.

Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] for five minutes.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, my opposition to this bill certainly arises from no other motive than my desire to see the principles which have heretofore uniformly regulated the legislation of this country upon the question of patents adhered to, and not departed from in a manner which I think would be entirely dangerous as a precedent. If I am correctly informed about the facts of this case, the report which has been made here from the Committee on Patents is not so remarkable for what it contains as for what it omits to state. If my information is correct, although it is true that this patentee, Mr. Harvey, died without securing from these patents a competency for his family; although it is true that his widow and heirs have perhaps received no substantial benefit from these patents; yet another thing is equally true, which should be a bar to the proposed extension, and that is, that the assignees of the patents of Thomas W. Harvey, men who claimed and held under him, who succeeded by his own act to his rights, have obtained immense fortunes from the patents which have already been granted.

The principal one of these patents was originally granted in 1846 for the term of fourteen years. It has been extended for seven years, the full limit allowed by our patent laws. As I am informed, Mr. Harvey having parted with his interest to other parties, these parties have carried on the business of making screws under it and have built up the most enormous, the most gigantic monopoly that this country has ever witnessed in a manufacturing article. These parties have not only had under these patents the potentiality, as Dr. Johnson said, of wealth beyond the dreams of avarice, but this potentiality has ripened into absolute fact, and fortunes have been accumulated and are accumulating to-day under these patents.

If that be so, I put it to the honorable gentlemen of the House on what principle are we to interfere between the heirs of the patentee and the grantees of the patentee? By what principle are we to say, because this man has perhaps made an unfortunate and foolish bargain in the sale of his patents and thus enabled his assignees and successors to realize wealth which he probably under other circumstances might have realized, how are we to say they are to be disregarded and the family now made good from loss, not from any defect in our laws, not from any want of liberality on our part, but from his own actions whether mistaken or compelled by circumstances? It seems to me, then, the principle which has always assumed to govern the legislation of this country is, wherever either the patentee, his heirs, his grantee, or any parties desiring title under him, have been sufficiently compensated that should be the end of the exclusive right. We are not to investigate whether parties who have obtained the fruits of the patent are the most deserving of them; but when the time expires the patented article should be thrown open to the public.

The gentleman says this involves no expense, that it takes no money out of the Treasury. Every exclusion of the public, every exclusive right to a manufacturer is a detriment to the country, and is only recognized on the ground that the inventor should have to some extent, some reasonable extent, which the law has fixed primarily at fourteen years, with a possible extension of half that time, in which to reap the fruits of his own invention. If by his act other parties have reaped those fruits it is no reason, it seems to me, why we should interfere and say, A having made a colossal fortune out of this thing at the expense of the public, we will turn in B in order to give him an opportunity to reap a second fortune. I believe the principle is an unsound one; and I believe the facts are as I have stated them. I call on the Committee on Patents if I do not give the history of this case as it actually exists. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BROMWELL. I yield now fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. Speaker, I agree with the statement made by the gentleman who reported this bill that it is the duty of the public to protect individuals who invent new or improved machines and present them to the public; and I am not one of those who would endeavor to deprive any man of his just claims to the fruits of his valuable invention. I admit also with the committee that these inventions of Mr. Harvey are indeed most valuable improvements. But the simple point to which I wish to call the attention of the House is that so far as the Government is concerned in this case we have fulfilled our entire obligation to the inventor. He received the benefit of his improvement by a patent being granted for fourteen years, and at the expiration of that time it was extended for seven years longer. The Government, therefore, so far as it is concerned, has discharged all of its obligations to the inventor of these improvements. No further obligation rests upon the Government.

The gentleman makes the point that, the inventor having parted with this patent without receiving a fair equivalent as he claims, the Government is placed under an obligation to extend the patent for an additional period. Suppose, for the sake of argument, that the reason assigned is a good one, and the patent is extended for seven years more, and the parties part with it for a nominal sum, would not the argument be the same and as strong at the end of that seven years? Is the Government under obligation to guaranty that an inventor will manage his own business shrewdly in the disposal of his patent?

If this inventor has not received an equivalent it is not the fault of the Government, for the public have paid millions and millions for this invention. It has been one of the greatest monopolies which existed in the country. It has been confined to a few manufacturers who controlled it, and they made enormous profits, and the people were compelled to submit to the monopoly.

I ask members of this House if, under these circumstances, they are going to vote to extend this monopoly? They will bear in mind that in this report it is said that all of these companies that have been building up immense fortunes at the expense of the public are to have the benefit of this extension, if it is granted, gratis.

The gentleman who spoke in favor of this extension says that the machines are very expensive, and that it costs a large amount of money to maintain a manufacture of this kind. Sir, that is the very best reason why it should not be extended. If the machines were cheap, if every individual with a small amount of money could enter into competition in the manufacture, even if the patent were extended, they could be afforded at a fair price. But if the patent is not extended these companies that are still in operation will have the monopoly of this manufacture at least for five years to come; because it is admitted on all hands that so extensive is the machinery required that it will take at least five years of free competition for new companies to be able to compete with the companies now in operation. And it will be understood by members of the House that there are two or three companies in this country to-day that are manufacturing these screws.

The gentleman from Iowa inquired how this interested the agricultural portion of the country. Sir, there is not an individual, no matter what his calling may be, who is not interested in the question of the extension of this patent. The farmer, the mechanic, all ranks and classes of men, have to use these articles almost as freely as the most common implement in use. There is not a person in the whole community that is not interested in the question of the extension of this patent beyond the period of twenty-one years. As I said before, the Government having done its duty in giving the patentee the monopoly for the full limit of the time allowed by law, I hope this House is not going to say that the public shall still pay a royalty for seven years longer. Let the manufacture be thrown open. We cannot rid ourselves of the present monopoly for five years to come even if the patent is not extended.

Mr. BROMWELL. I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa five minutes.

Mr. ALLISON. After what my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WASHBURN] has said, it is perhaps unnecessary for me to add anything. But there are one or two facts in connection with this patent that I think the House ought to understand. This patent either has a value or it has not. If it has a value it is to be of benefit either to the parties who receive this extension or to the public. Now, I am told that there are seven or eight new companies in process of organization for the manufacture of this class of screws, which enter into the consumption of the entire country, and as the gentleman from Illinois himself says, it requires a large amount of capital to organize these corporations to manufacture these screws, the heirs of Harvey can only be benefited by selling this patent to some one of these companies. Now, I want to ask the chairman of the committee who introduced this bill, whether he proposes, if this invention has a value, to transfer that value to one of these seven or eight companies; or whether the community is not entitled to the benefit of it by having all these companies compete in the manufacture?

Now, I do know that the American Screw Company, that has had the benefit of this patent for the last two years, absolutely bought off an English screw company from bringing their products to this market. It paid them a royalty of some thirty or forty thousand dollars annually, if they would not throw their articles into competition in the American market. Now are we to have that same thing perpetuated in this country so as to increase the price of these articles to the consumers all over the country? For myself I shall never consent to it. If this patent has a value let it be given to the community; if it has no value it cannot inure to the benefit of anybody.

If some gentleman does not move to lay this bill on the table, I shall do so at the proper time.

Mr. BROMWELL. I will now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] for two minutes.

Mr. STEVENS. Two minutes is all I ask. I remember that for the last five or six years, and perhaps longer, while I was a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, this screw question was before us on the question of imposing additional duties. A very adroit and able man, a Senator from the State of Rhode Island, generally gave it his particular attention. During that investigation my recollection is that it was shown, and was hardly denied, that this company have semi-annually declared large dividends. And it was shown most conclusively that not another screw of this character was made in America, and that whenever other companies got up machines approaching to this, this company bought out those machines, and the English companies who had the right to use it were bought off by a sum of money in gross every year.

I look upon this as one of the most profitable companies that ever existed, and I should think it a strange thing if we should extend this patent for the benefit of the assignees of the original patentees. I thought it proper to state this because I recollect the circumstances of the case.

Mr. BROMWELL. I will now yield for two minutes to the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.]

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the extension of patents at any time beyond twenty-one years, and fourteen years I think is long enough. If the parties cannot in that time make money the company ought to close its affairs and attend to some other business.

In regard to this case, if there is a single patent that ought to be extinguished at the end of twenty-one years, it is this patent for the manufacture of screws, because it is conceded, and is a matter of public notoriety, that the stock of this company is two or three hundred per cent. above par and has been for years. This matter has already been considered in relation to the internal taxes and the tariff. I am opposed to all such measures.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I ask one minute from the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BROMWELL. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I want to say that only the poor widow and orphans are put forward in this case. I will send to the Clerk's desk to be read what will show that they assigned all their interest in the patent to other parties. It is the report of the referees appointed to settle this matter with certain companies.

The Clerk read as follows:

"In the matter of the claims against the American Screw Company of Providence, Rhode Island, made by the owners of Harvey's patents of May 30, 1848, for threading wood screws, and of August 18, 1848, for a machine for dressing the heads of screw blanks, both of which patents have been extended for the period of seven years: said patents and extensions have been extended to the American Screw Company, and the referees are to determine the sum which the claimants are entitled to receive from the American Screw Company for the rights so assigned from the formation of the company to the expiration of the extended term and for any further renewals thereof."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. The House will understand that in case of this renewal it will go to the company and not to these parties.

Mr. HILL. I desire to know whether, as this bill was framed for the purpose of extending this patent solely for the benefit of the heirs of the original patentee, it will obviate this clause which seems to be in this contract, which comes before the House in the paper presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. WASHBURN,] that any extension shall be for the benefit of the assignees? That is a matter I want light upon.

Mr. BROMWELL. I will state what I understand to be the facts in this case as set forth by the parties in the memorial which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WASHBURN] had read at the desk. It concerns the original extension by the Commissioner of Patents.

No application for an extension of a patent comes before the House except after it has been extended for twenty-one years. Other extensions are granted by the Commissioner of Patents, and when his power of extension is exhausted the applications for extension come to Congress.

Now, sir, as much as the Committee on Patents may dislike to press private matters on the time and attention of the House when public business is pressing, yet when such matters in due course come before the committee it becomes as much their duty to thoroughly investigate the claims of the parties and deal justly with them as it would be in the case of a judge. The committee examined most thoroughly the case set forth in the memorial of the parties. The very fact to which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WASHBURN] has referred, that under a former transfer the widow and heirs can receive nothing, is a reason why Congress, in accordance with time-honored precedents in like cases, should make a further extension to them.

As to the assignees, the bill which I have the honor to present says expressly that the extension shall be for the benefit of the widow and heirs alone.

Who are these monopolists in New York and Massachusetts of whom the gentleman from Pennsylvania speaks? They are precisely those who, having capital in a business requiring a great outlay of money, have built for themselves vast factories, but they are using perhaps a hundred different machines. Of all those machines a great many are the invention of Thomas W. Harvey, of which the public has reaped the profit from the day they were invented. He could not use his patents during his lifetime for want of means, and they have inured to the benefit of the country.

Let me say to gentlemen that it is a great benefit to the public that these manufactures should exist, and they have lowered the price of these articles permanently to the consumers throughout the country.

This widow and these heirs are not the American Screw Company, and are not the Continental Screw Company. They have nothing in common with those companies. The profits derived from the last extension went to neither the widow nor the heirs. It went to the men who advanced the money to Thomas W. Harvey, by means of which he made the very machinery which the manufacturers now use. The profits of that extension went to reimburse the men who advanced money after Mr. Harvey had spent $100,000 in an attempt to invent and perfect this class of machinery. They are satisfied; but the widow and heirs got nothing. Thomas W. Harvey died without sixpence profit. His widow and heirs are here to-day; not only denied by the monopolists of these manufacturing companies any share in the profits arising from Harvey's labors, but in this House they are denied recognition by a portion of the House for a mere imaginary reason, it seems to me, which would send them penniless away, without even a recognition at the hands of their countrymen that the American inventor is in any way to be taken care of.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand what is represented to be the solemn award of the arbitrators between these heirs and the assignees, which contains these words:

"Said patents and extension have been assigned to the American Screw Company; and the referees are to determine the sum which the claimants are entitled to receive for the rights so assigned, and that they are the property of the American Screw Company from the time of the formation of the company to the expiration of the extended term, and for any further renewals thereof."

Now, the question I wish to put is this: if it be true that by a contract between Mr. Harvey and the American Screw Company the right in his patents has been vested absolutely in the company, including the right to all further renewals to him or to his heirs, and if that contract has been confirmed by a solemn award between the parties, can any action of this House take away the rights arising out of that award, and will this bill prevent the benefits to be derived under it from inuring to the assignees of these parties?

Mr. HILL. I desire to know whether, in the opinion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE,] this paper can prohibit Congress from passing such laws as it may deem necessary for the benefit of the heirs without the assignees getting the benefit of it?

Mr. HALE. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say that it is a very Yankee way of answering my question for another question to be asked me by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HILL.] I do not pretend that any contract between the parties can prevent Congress from adopting any legislation they may see fit; but I do say that if there has been a vested right passed to the American Screw Company, by a contract confirmed by an award of arbitrators, no action of Congress can interfere with that right.

Mr. BROMWELL. In answer to the question I will state that some, at least, of these heirs are minors, and the gentleman will not contend that any contract or arbitration like this will bind them. The Committee on Patents took all this into consideration, and they were satisfied that there was an equity in the claim of this widow and these heirs, and they are all that we have to deal with. The Commissioner of Patents has the same question before him every time he extends a patent which has run fourteen years; and the evidence in this case showed that Mr. Harvey, owing to certain circumstances which pressed him down, stood precisely where he did after the expiration of the seven years' extension.

It has been the usage of the Government to do this thing, and if it had not been, where would have been the use of a Committee on Patents at all? If these gentlemen are right there should never be any extension of patents by the House.

Again, gentlemen suggest that this patent will inure by virtue of law, notwithstanding what this House may do, to the benefit of the American Screw Company. I do not so understand it, and the committee did not so understand it. Moreover, the bill does not extend the patent. It merely authorizes the Commissioner of Patents, a man who is selected and placed there for the express purpose of determining these matters according to the principles of justice and sound public policy, in case after due notice and on full examination he shall find it proper, to authorize the extension of the patent.

I now move the previous question.

Mr. MYERS. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BROMWELL] withdraw his call for the previous question and yield to me for five minutes?

Mr. BROMWELL. Very well; I will do so.

Mr. MYERS. I cannot hope by any words of mine to add to the force of the arguments of my colleague on the Committee on Patents [Mr. BROMWELL] if the House has listened to them, and I believe the majority of the members here have done so.

But I rise for the purpose of endeavoring to answer the several gentlemen who have urged objections to the passage of this bill. And first, I will say to my legal friend from New York [Mr. HALE] that the language of the agreement to which he refers in relation to a renewal will not cover a congressional extension or new grant by Congress. At least so I read the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States on this subject in Gibson vs. Cook, Pitts vs. Hall, and Bloomer vs. McQuervan. Even if it would have done so the bill before us disposes of that question and reextends the patent for the benefit of General Harvey's heirs only. Secondly, I will say in answer to my distinguished colleague, [Mr. STEVENS,] that the applications to which he and the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. MORRILL] have referred, for a reduction of the tax upon wood screws, related to other articles and not to those made by these identical machines.

I would again call the attention of the House to the fact that Thomas W. Harvey produced a series of machines for the purpose of manufacturing wood screws; that the right to use a majority of those machines has gone to the public, which now enjoys the undisputed benefit of them; that he expended $100,000 of his own money, and borrowed $70,000 more in order to perfect this series of inventions; that what has been referred to by several gentlemen here, in the paper which was sent to the Clerk's desk to be read, vaguely hinted at in order to produce opposition on the part of this House, was simply an agreement between the party to whom the heirs, in consequence of that loan to their father, gave the Patent Office extension and the American Screw Company. That agreement had nothing whatever to do with General Harvey or his heirs; those heirs merely furnished evidence in regard to the value of said inventions. If the gentlemen had read the whole case they would have ascertained that fact.

I say to this House that General Harvey expended $170,000 to perfect these machines; and his heirs honorably carried out the promise made by their father, by assigning the extension of the patent for the purpose of refunding the money borrowed by him. And now because these monopolists write here and try to defeat the congressional grant to these deserving heirs, distinguished gentlemen rise upon this floor and argue that somebody else has made money out of these inventions, and therefore the inventor and his heirs must go unrewarded. I do not suppose of course that such is the object of the opponents of this bill, but the direct consequence of their opposition if successful will be to favor these very monopolists against whom they seem so zealous.

This House has several times granted extensions of patents, though that is a thing which the Committee on Patents have seldom asked. Extensions are granted by Congress upon the express idea and assertion, and upon no other ground, that an inventor or his heirs have not been properly compensated and desire further protection sufficient to enable them to reap the fruits of their genius. That is the case here.

One word more; there are two hundred different sizes of these wood screws manufactured. In order to make them, each one requires a machine for heading, one for shaving, one for nicking, and two for threading, as the latter process takes twice as long as the others. Therefore it requires an immense amount of machinery to carry on this manufacture; and an immense capital, as shown, was requisite to perfect and carry it on. Now, because the American Screw Company obtained the control of the business from the party to whom these heirs honorably assigned the extension of these patents, because they have reaped the benefit of it, it is proposed that, with their immense capital, they shall retain the monopoly they now have, and prevent the heirs of this inventor from receiving from Congress the same consideration that has been awarded to meritorious inventors in like cases.

Mr. HALE. I desire simply to repeat the question I propounded when I was on the floor a few minutes ago. Is it not conceded that the grantees of this man Harvey have made enormous fortunes out of these very patents, two of which are now before us?

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has six and a half minutes yet remaining.

Mr. BROMWELL. I will answer the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE.] I suppose the assignees of these patents have made money out of them, and would like to make more. And I understand there is not a great monopoly in this country that does not resist the application of these poor heirs and this widow for this congressional extension; for they hold the tenure of their monopoly, not by the patents, but by the immense amount of capital necessary to wield a factory to carry on the business. A factory in which four hundred of these machines could play would fill an area equal to that occupied by one wing of this Capitol. This is the answer to the objections urged against the extension now proposed. It is the heirs who are to be benefited; and the question is, shall they go away with neither thanks nor money nor recognition at the hands of this Congress? Mr. Speaker, I now call the previous question.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the bill be laid on the table.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 71, nays 75, not voting 44; as follows:

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired and the bill goes over until the next private bill day.

CAPTAIN DANIEL C. TREWHITT.

Mr. STOKES. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution for the relief of Captain Daniel C. Trewitt. It is the same which I desired to introduce a few days ago, when the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] suggested that the case was covered by general law, and therefore I did not press the measure at that time. I find that the general law does not cover the case.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was read a first and second time. It proposes to direct the Paymaster General to pay to Captain Daniel C. Trewitt, of Tennessee, full pay for four months' service in the United States Army as captain and adjutant general on the staff of Brigadier General James G. Spear, Tennessee volunteers.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STOKES moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

STRAW WRAPPING-PAPER.

Mr. KETCHAM, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the propriety of removing the internal revenue tax from straw wrapping-paper and of placing the same on the free list, and that they be permitted to report by bill or otherwise.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, leave of absence was granted to Mr. CHANLER for one week.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing was received from the President, by Mr. WILLIAM G. MOORE, one of his Secretaries.

SCHOONER ALPHA.

Mr. HUMPHREY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to grant an American register to the schooner Alpha; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

MILTON VELZY.

Mr. HUMPHREY also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of Milton Velzy; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

ARSENAL AT ST. LOUIS.

Mr. HOGAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to enlarge the United States arsenal at St. Louis, Missouri; which was read a first and second time, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed bills, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, of the following titles:

An act (S. No. 302) for the relief of the Mercantile Mutual Insurance Company of New York;

An act (S. No. 537) to amend an act entitled "An act to extend the time for the reversion to the United States of the lands granted by Congress to aid in the construction of a railroad from Amboy, by Hillsdale and Lansing, to some point on or near Traverse bay, in the State of Michigan, and for the completion of said road," approved July 3, 1866; and

An act (S. No. 272) to authorize the corporation of Washington to reduce the width and improve the avenues and streets of that city.

The message further informed the House that the Senate had postponed indefinitely a bill (H. R. No. 819) for the relief of Richard A. Vervalen and others.

The message further informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment a joint resolution (H. R. No. 126) for the relief of certain settlers on the Sioux reservation in the State of Kansas.

The message further informed the House that the Senate had passed a bill (H. R. No. 874) to regulate the duties of the Clerk of the House of Representatives in preparing for the organization of the House, and for other purposes, with an amendment in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 605) to amend an act to establish the judicial courts of the United States, approved September 24, 1789;

An act (H. R. No. 719) to punish certain crimes in relation to the public securities and currency, and for other purposes; and

An act (H. R. No. 388) to authorize the extension, construction, and use of a lateral branch of the Baltimore and Potomac railroad into and within the District of Columbia.

IOWA CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a message from the President, transmitting information in response to resolution of the House respecting the execution of an act providing for the appointment of a commission to examine and report on certain claims of the State of Iowa, approved July 25, 1866; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

MEXICO.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a message from the President, transmitting, in answer to resolutions of the House requesting information of the present condition of affairs in Mexico and desiring copies of correspondence on the subject of the evacuation of Mexico by French troops not before officially published, a report from the Secretary of State; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

APPOINTMENTS TO OFFICE.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a message from the President, transmitting reports from the heads of the several Executive Departments containing information asked for by resolution of the House in respect to appointments to office, &c.; which, on motion of Mr. MYERS, was referred to the select Committee on the Civil Service, and ordered to be printed.

TENURE OF CIVIL OFFICES.

The SPEAKER announced as the first business in order after the morning hour the bill (S. No. 453) entitled "An act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices;" on which Mr. HALE was entitled to the floor.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to speak now on this bill; but I have a proposition to submit to the House.

This is a very important bill both as regards questions of principle and policy. Its subject has already been discussed in this House at very considerable length upon the bill introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WILLIAMS.] In view of this fact I do not deem it necessary that the same time be afforded for discussion on the bill as if it were entirely a new measure. Several gentlemen are desirous to speak upon it; and the proposition I have to make is that by universal consent debate be limited to thirty minutes instead of an hour for each speaker. I am anxious to bring the measure to a vote, if possible, to-day.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, it will be understood that no member shall be entitled to speak more than thirty minutes on this bill.

There was no objection.

Mr. HALE. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FINCK.]

Mr. FINCK. Mr. Speaker, this bill proposes to take from the executive branch of the Government a power which has been uninterruptedly exercised by that department from the commencement of the administration of General Washington, and expressly recognized and sanctioned by both the legislative and judicial departments of the Government since 1789, and ought not to receive the sanction of this House unless clearly warranted by the Constitution, and imperatively demanded by the true interests of the country.

It is a question which should be considered and discussed free from all party bias, because it is a measure which proposes to reverse a long, well-established, and uninterrupted practice of the Government, and to substitute in its place a new system, which is not only to affect the administration of the executive branch of this Government by the present Chief Magistrate, but also the administrations of future Presidents.

It is not my purpose, Mr. Speaker, to detain the House by an examination of the mere details of this bill, or enter upon a lengthy or elaborate discussion of the questions involved in it, but will content myself by stating briefly some of the reasons why I oppose the passage of this measure.

The material inquiry is, has the President, under the Constitution, the power to remove from office in such cases where the tenure is not fixed by the Constitution without the concurrence of the Senate, although the Senate was required to concur in the appointment?

The provisions of the Constitution relating to appointments provide that—

"The President shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall appoint, ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, Judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments."

The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions, which shall expire at the end of their next session."

Now, it is claimed by the advocates of the bill under consideration, that the words "all vacancies that may happen" mean only such vacancies as may happen by accident or casualty, without any agency of the President in bringing them about. Such, sir, has never been the construction of these words by any department of the Government.

In the act of September 2, 1789, establishing the Treasury Department, it was provided:

"That whenever the Secretary shall be removed from office by the President of the United States, or in any other case of vacancy in the office, the assistant shall act," &c.

Thus early was a legislative construction given to the power of the President to make removals without the concurrence of the Senate.

It will be observed that the act of 1789 does not by express terms confer upon the President the power to remove the Secretary of the Treasury, but recognizes the existence of such power in the President, and provides who shall act in case the President shall remove the Secretary from office. Chancellor Kent, referring to this act, says:

"This amounted to a legislative construction of the Constitution, and it has ever since been acquiesced in and acted upon as of decisive authority in the case. It applies equally to every other officer of Government appointed by the President and Senate whose term of duration is not specially declared. It is supported by the weighty reason that the subordinate officers in the executive department ought to hold at the pleasure of the head of that department, because he is invested generally with the executive authority, and every participation in that authority by the Senate was an exception to a general principle and ought to be taken strictly. The President is the great responsible officer for the faithful execution of the law; and the power of removal was incidental to that duty, and might often be requisite to fulfill it."

Mr. Wirt, when Attorney General in 1823, in giving an opinion on the question of appointments and removals, commenting on the word "happen," used the following language:

"But the expression used by the Constitution is 'happen'; all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate. The most natural sense of this term is to 'chance'—to fall out—to take place by accident. But the expression seems not perfectly clear. It may mean happen to take place; that is 'to originate'; under which sense the President would have the right to fill it by his temporary commission. Which of these two senses is to be preferred? The first seems to me most accordant with the letter of the Constitution; the second most accordant with its reason and spirit."

And he concludes:

"The construction which I prefer is perfectly innocent. It cannot possibly produce mischief without imputing to the President a degree of turpitude entirely inconsistent with the character which his office implies, as well as with the high responsibility and short tenure annexed to that office, while at the same time it insures to the public the accomplishment of the object to which the Constitution so sedulously looks—that the offices connected with their peace and safety be regularly filled."

I believe similar opinions were entertained by such men as Pinckney and Taney and Legare and Barrien and Cushing.

But this power of removal without the concurrence of the Senate has also been recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States.

I refer to the learned opinion delivered in the case of ex parte Duncan N. Hennen by Justice Thompson, one of the ablest of the many distinguished jurists who have adorned the bench of the Supreme Court, in which he says in 13 Peters, 259:

"This power of removal from office was a subject much disputed and upon which a great diversity of opinion was entertained in the early history of this Government. This related, however, to the power of the President to remove officers appointed with the concurrence of the Senate; and the great question was whether the removal was to be by the President alone or with the concurrence of the Senate, both constituting the appointing power. No one denied the power of the President and Senate jointly to remove where the tenure of the office was not fixed by the Constitution, which was a full recognition of the principle that the power of removal was incident to the power of appointment. But it was very early adopted as the practical construction of the Constitution that the power was vested in the President alone. And such would appear to have been the legislative construction of the Constitution, for in the organization of the three great departments of State, War, and Treasury in the year 1789 provision is made for the appointment of a subordinate officer by the head of the Departments who should have the charge and custody of the records, books, and papers appertaining to the office when the head of the Department should be removed from the office of [by] the President of the United States. (1 Story, 5, 31, 47.) When the Navy Department was established, in the year 1793, (1 Story, 498,) provision was made for the charge and custody of the books, records, and documents of the Department in case of vacancy in the office of Secretary by removal or otherwise. It is not here said by removal by the President, as is done with respect to the heads of the other Departments, and yet there can be no doubt that he holds his office by the same tenure as the other Secretaries, and is removable by the President. The change of phraseology arose probably from its having become the settled and well-understood construction of the Constitution that the power of removal was vested in the President alone in such cases, although the appointment of the officer was by the President and Senate."

But gentlemen say that there is no express power conferred upon the President to make removals. I answer, neither is there any express power conferred by the Constitution for removals by the concurrent action of the President and the Senate; but no one denies that the power of removal does exist where the tenure of the office is not fixed by the Constitution. Whence is the power derived? I answer, not simply as an incident to the appointing power, but that it belongs to and is an incident of the executive power, which is vested in the President, who is charged with the execution of the laws, and in the performance of which duty he is obliged to appoint agents as the instruments through which he may be enabled to discharge properly the grave responsibilities imposed upon him by his office; and being responsible for the faithful discharge of the duties incumbent upon the executive branch of the Government, he must, as an incident of the powers of the Executive, have the right of removal in the cases already mentioned.

But it is said that abuses have grown up under the exercise of this power by the Executive. It is quite probable. Indeed, it would be very strange if such were not the fact; but is it more likely that these abuses would be less frequent and less serious to the public interests if the responsibility was divided and the Senate should be authorized to act upon such removals, and its assent be necessary before they could be made?

It is our imperative duty, wherever we can do so by the exercise of legitimate power, to prevent abuses and provide remedies against them, but with the greatest vigilance they cannot be entirely prevented. They grow out of the imperfections which have always existed and will always exist, even in the most perfect forms of civil governments; and while I would be unwilling to sanction the exercise of any powers in the Executive which does not belong to him, I am at the same time unwilling to sanction any attempt to invade the just rights of that department of the Government or take from that officer the exercise of a power which has been recognized as belonging to him from the foundation of the Government.

Mr. Madison, in a letter written to Edward Coles in 1834, referring to the claim made that the Senate had a right to act upon the removals made by the President, says:

"You are at a loss for the innovating doctrines to which I alluded. Permit me to specify the following: 'The claim on constitutional grounds to a share in the removals as well as in the appointment of officers is in direct opposition to the uniform practice of the Government from its commencement. It is clear that the innovation would not only vary essentially the existing balance of power, but expose the Executive occasionally to a total inaction, and at all times to delays fatal to the due execution of the laws. Another innovation brought forward in the Senate claims for the Legislature a discretionary regulation of the tenure of offices. This also would vary the relation of the departments to each other, and leave a wide field for legislative abuses. The power of removal, like that of appointment, ought to be fixed by the Constitution, and both, like the right of suffrage and appointment of Representatives, to be not dependent on the legislative will. In republican Governments the organization of the executive department will always be found the most difficult and delicate, particularly in regard to the appointment, and most of all to the removal of officers. It may well deserve consideration how far the present modification of those powers can be constitutionally improved.'"

Certainly the present distinguished Attorney General may feel himself fortified and fully sustained by these high authorities; although the learned gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] in alluding to his opinion on this subject, has been pleased to say of him that it would—

"Be asking perhaps too much to expect that an officer who holds his life at the pleasure of the President should be found standing in the way of the prerogative in times like these."

It is unnecessary for me to enter upon any defense of the Attorney General. He stands deservedly in the front rank of the profession which he has adorned, not only by his eminent abilities as a lawyer, but by his character as an upright and patriotic citizen.

But why should I detain the House longer by a reference to the opinions of these eminent men? Are not the statesmen of to-day who control the legislation of this nation wiser than the fathers? It is true that Chancellor Kent has deliberately said that the power of the President to remove in the class of cases already named—

"May now be considered as firmly and definitely settled, and there is good sense and practical utility in the construction."

And that Mr. Madison, in speaking of the claim made on behalf of the Senate in cases of removal, as already quoted, has declared—

"The claim on constitutional ground to a share in the removal as well as appointment of officers is in direct opposition to the uniform practice of the Government from its commencement."

Or what difference does it make that Justice Thompson has solemnly announced, in the opinion in 13 Peters, that it had—

"Become the settled and well understood construction of the Constitution that the power of removal was vested in the President alone in such cases, although the appointment of the officers was by the President and Senate?"

Has not the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in his speech in support of this bill, referring to what had been said in support of the construction heretofore placed upon the power of removal by the President, told us that it was—

"Something in the way of argument that not even the deservedly great reputation of Mr. Madison himself can commend to the disciplined logician of the present day?"

Mr. Speaker, the disciplined logicians of whom the gentleman speaks must be those men who have advanced too far (and I say it without the least intentional disrespect to any gentleman of this House) to be hampered in their construction of the Constitution by the opinions of such men as Washington, and Jefferson, and Adams, and Madison, and Pinckney, and Wirt, and Jackson, and Taney, or by the uniform construction of every department of the Government on this question since the adoption of the Constitution.

Sir, I trust I have a due appreciation of the statesmanship of the gentlemen whose opinions control the legislation of this Congress; but I prefer to follow the fathers, and leave this power of removal just where the framers of the Constitution and every Congress which has assembled since 1789 have left it. And I hope that gentlemen who in the recent campaign have had so much to say in disparagement of what they styled the "bread-and-butter brigade" will so act on this question as not to excite any well-grounded suspicion in the public mind that they are now really themselves ambitious to have control of that much-abused class of men.

Sir, this is an attempt to deprive the present Executive of the exercise of a power which has been exercised by all of his predecessors. And why is this to be done? Is it because the President has exercised this power to a greater extent than his predecessors during the last thirty years? No one who is at all acquainted with our history will make such a charge.

Why, what is the extent of this great power of executive patronage which disturbs gentlemen so much? One would think, from the clamor and abuse which we have heard uttered against President Johnson on this floor, that his removals were to be counted by the thousand; but there could be no greater mistake.

In the discussion of this question in the Senate it was developed that the whole number of presidential appointments in the civil service of the United States was only two thousand four hundred and thirty-four, distributed as follows: in the Department of State, three hundred and forty; in the Treasury Department, nine hundred and seventy-three; in the Interior Department, two hundred and ten; in the Post Office Department, seven hundred and nine; and in the office of the Attorney General, two hundred and two. And how many removals do you suppose the President has made up to the middle of January? Why, sir, four hundred and forty-six, as follows: in the State Department, ten; Treasury Department, one hundred and ninety-nine; Department of the Interior, twenty-one; in the Post Office Department, one hundred and ninety-seven; and in the office of the Attorney General, nineteen. Can it be possible that because of these four hundred and forty-six removals we are called upon to pass this measure? No, sir; this is but one of a series of attacks which have been made and are likely to be continued against the President, because he has dared to go straight-forward in the faithful discharge of the grave responsibilities of his high office; because he does not believe with the gentlemen who control this Congress that ten of the States of this Union have been reduced to mere territories; because he insists that they are States in the Union, equal in their rights and dignity with the other States, and constitutionally entitled to be represented in this House and in the Senate, and to participate in the election of President and Vice President. Yes, he stands by the Union of the States under the Constitution, and for this he is assailed; for this his Administration is to be singled out, and the office which he administers is to be stripped of the exercise of a power which every department of the Government since its organization has said belonged to it.

Legislation like this, Mr. Speaker, when it comes to be examined by that calm and deliberate public opinion which will sooner or later consider all these questions, will not, I trust, be sanctioned by the American people.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move to amend by striking out these words:

Excepting the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, and of the Interior, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General.

So that the first section will then read:

That every person holding any civil office to which he has been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and every person who shall hereafter be appointed to any such office, and shall become duly qualified to act therein, is and shall be entitled to hold such office until a successor shall have been in like manner appointed and duly qualified, except as herein otherwise provided.

Mr. Speaker, having already spoken so much at large on the general principles involved in this projected measure of reform, I do not now propose to rehearse what I have said, but will endeavor to confine myself in what I have to offer to the amendment I have just submitted.

That amendment seems to me to be essential to the symmetry of the bill, essential to its completeness, essential to its efficacy, essential to it as a remedial measure, which shall be coextensive with the evil which it proposes to correct, and essential, I think, to the satisfaction of the general demands of the American public. The principle of this bill, which comes to us from the Senate, like that I had the honor to report to this House, involves a negation, as I may say, of the doctrine of the right of removal at the mere will of the Executive, which has so generally prevailed in the practice of this nation. It recognizes it as an evil; it proposes to rectify that evil; but it stops short in the exception which covers the heads of the several Departments of the Government, as indicated in the Constitution. In this I think the bill is defective. With the elimination of this exception, I think it will be of great practical value. Without it, we shall be only pruning off a little of the redundant foliage, instead of applying the ax to the root of the tree.

Why is it that these, the highest officers in the Government, are excepted, while the bill aims only at lower and inferior ones? The reason is, as I understand it, that the heads of Departments are the constitutional, perhaps I should not say constitutional, but at all events the confidential advisers of the Executive, and that unity in council is essential to a proper administration of the powers of that Department; in other words, that so far as regards the executive branch of the public service there should be only one universal will pervading the whole vast domain of this Republic; that there is to be no reference to the will of the people, no responsibility in that direction whatever, but that all things are to be referred to the supreme pleasure of the Executive, who is to be in that respect all in all.

I take leave just here to say, what I suppose no one in this House will question, that there is no advisory council known to our Constitution except the Senate of the United States. True it is that the heads of Departments have been generally recognized and characterized as "the Cabinet," and equally true it is that from the foundation of the Government the Chief Executive Magistrate has applied to them for such advice as he might desire; but it does not follow that he may not with equal propriety seek it elsewhere. He may consult them, however, and I am free to admit that their opinions are entitled to great weight so long as they are in the condition of independent officers; but when the idea of advice is combined with that of a compulsory unity, a unity constrained by the power of the Executive over the tenure of the officer, I do not know how these positions are to be reconciled with each other. To exercise the office of a counselor it is of the first necessity that the party who holds it should enjoy the most perfect freedom. If he subsists upon the breath of the Executive Magistrate and holds his place by his mere arbitrary will, is it likely that his opinions will be governed by any reference to the interests of the country?

Why, sir, if these high functionaries are to depend solely upon that will, then they are in no different position, so far as regards the nation, from, and are of no more value to its executive head than are the minions and sycophants who live on the breath of a despot and poison his ear by their mendacious flattery. What man of sense, for example, would undertake to say that with a Cabinet council composed of creatures standing in habitual awe of the Executive and under the constant terror of the bow-string, from the grand vizier down to the very lowest in the grade of service, that any honest or manly advice was likely to be obtained or even possible?

Is this so much desiderated unity consistent then with the idea that the men conforming to it shall occupy the position of advisers when they are held under bonds like this? To treat them as such, if not very like a joke, is the very climax of absurdity.

And now, Mr. Speaker, what is there in the relations of the Executive of the United States to these officers under the Constitution which should entitle him to control them? Does the Constitution intend it? Unquestionably not, but the very contrary. Have the heads of Departments no duties to perform except such as are assigned to them by the Executive himself? The Congress of the United States is expressly authorized by the terms of the Constitution to lodge with them the power of appointing to all inferior offices. We do invest them with other powers, and we impose upon them other duties in almost every day and hour of our legislative experiences. Are these men not officers of the Government, but the mere agents and servants of the Executive? Is there no responsibility to us? Is there none to the law? There may be, there now is; but under present circumstances, and with this power of removal reserved to the Executive, and unfortunately recognized as belonging to him alone and exercisable without appeal ever since the year 1789, of what value to the nation is that constitutional provision which gives to us the power of lodging these appointments in the hands of his subordinates? None whatever. Its exercise by us has become in effect a mere farce, a cheat, and a delusion—an empty and idle assertion of authority.

Allow me to appeal to the practice, and to ask what is the experience of this nation on this subject? For if we are not to learn wisdom in that school we shall be a great many years in the process of growing wise. On this point it is only necessary to call the attention of this House to the case of the removal of the deposits in 1833. Mr. Duane, it will be recollected, was then Secretary of the Treasury. The charter of the Bank of the United States provided, if my recollection serves me, that the deposits of the public moneys should be made in that institution, and should remain with it unless the Secretary of the Treasury at any time, upon information satisfactory to himself, should judge them to be insecure. General Jackson, who was then Chief Magistrate, (with, as we know, a will of his own, and an iron one, too,) insisted upon their removal. Mr. Duane, the Secretary of the Treasury, believing them to be safe, refused to obey the order, to his honor be it said. He did not look to the pregnant fact that he was holding his office by the precarious tenure of executive will. He was man enough—and I am sorry, for the country's sake, that there are so few resembling him—to overlook and despise that consideration, and peremptorily refused to do the work he was commanded. And what was the result? The answer of the President, as it has been generally reported—and I have no doubt, from the internal evidence, that it is true—was, that if Mr. Duane would not do his will and defer to his authority in the premises he would find another man who would. And he did find that compliant man in the person of Roger B. Taney, then Attorney General, who was transferred to the Treasury for that object, and faithfully and submissively performed the work that he was put upon.

Here, then, was the case of a power lodged with and a duty imposed by an act of Congress on the Secretary of the Treasury, and that power and the performance of the duty overridden and overruled by the arbitrary fiat of the Chief Magistrate, and his purpose accomplished and his will enforced by turning out the officer for no other reason than because he proved to be conscientious and felt that he owed duties to the law which were superior to those he owed to the Magistrate from whom he derived and under whom he held his commission as the head of one of the Departments of the Government.

But this is not all. The Constitution of the United States, as I have already remarked, authorizes Congress to vest the appointing power either in the Chief Magistrate alone or in the heads of Departments or in the courts, so far as regards the appointing of inferior officers, who comprise, I suppose—and this is in accordance with the opinion of Judge Story—at least ninety-nine out of every hundred of the valuable and paying offices of this nation.

Well, sir, we have exercised that power in sundry instances. It was not intended, as the terms of this provision show, that the Executive should appoint in all cases, although all these are to be regarded as executive officers. It did intend that this power should be parceled out and divided. It was its obvious spirit and purpose that Congress should lodge it with high functionaries, who it was reasonably supposed would be sufficiently independent for its safe, judicious exercise. We have exercised that power in some instances. We have vested the Postmaster General with the faculty of appointing to all post offices where the salary is less than one thousand dollars per annum. We have vested the Secretary of the Interior with the power of appointing pension agents and perhaps other officers; and yet it is a transparent fact, well known to every man conversant with the business of these offices, that appointments are made every day by the President himself, in cases where the power is lodged with the head of the Department, without consulting and even without the knowledge of the head of the Department himself!

And here, in the way of illustration, I am reminded of a very recent case in the person of a pension agent who received a notice of removal without any previous complaint that he was aware of against him; and upon application to the Secretary of the Interior, to whom the appointment belonged under the law, was informed by that functionary that he knew nothing about the case, and was not even aware of the fact of his supersedure. The result is, therefore, as practically shown no doubt in hundreds of instances, that under present circumstances, with the heads of Departments depending for their official life on the arbitrary pleasure of the Executive, this important provision of the Constitution is practically blotted out and our power over the subject substantially abdicated.

I know that my very worthy friend who sits before me, [Mr. HALE,] with his strong conservative leanings in favor of old abuses, will dissent from me on this question. The bill from the Senate now before us is, I believe, the same reported here by himself from the joint Committee on Retrenchment, which is now depending as an amendment, or rather substitute for the bill reported by me from the Judiciary Committee of this House. There may be some slight differences, but they are, I think, substantially the same.

And now, with a view of showing to the House that I have the full indorsement on the part of that committee, through one of its accredited organs on this floor, of the very opinions and views I have been expressing, I will take the liberty of referring to the very able speech made by the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. JENCKES] a few days ago in the consideration of the bill in relation to appointment to the civil service, in which I take it that he expresses the opinions of the committee. I shall be pardoned of course for reading a paragraph from that speech which is so much to the purpose as the following:

"TENDENCY TOWARD CENTRALIZATION.

"Another evil, and one which may become of greater magnitude and threaten greater danger to the Republic than any other, is that already suggested, of the direct interference of the Chief Executive in the appointment of officers which by law is vested in the heads of Departments, claiming to exercise over these chiefs the power of removal without the assent of the Senate, as well as exercising the power of appointment with the Senate's advice and consent. His will controls the heads of Departments, in whose discretion the Congress has by law under the Constitution vested the selection of these inferior officers. Thus the whole public civil service, in the language of the resolution appointing this committee, is 'being used as an instrument of political or party patronage,' and with the leader of the political party in power, or of one that seeks to be in power, in the executive Mansion, one of the greatest evils which can endanger the existence of a republic springs into existence in the very heart of ours—that of the centralization of all appointing as well as executive power in one person. The framers of the Constitution wisely guarded against this centralizing tendency by the clause already quoted, but under the present system that guard is a nullity."

This is well and conclusively put, and fully authorizes me, I think, to say that if my worthy friend from New York dissents from my argument here he dissents equally from the logic of the paragraph from his colleague's speech to which I have referred. I think I have understood from him, however, that he indorses the whole of that speech.

If, then, I have not misapprehended him, I shall have a right to expect him to join hands and stand shoulder to shoulder with me in this endeavor to make the heads of the Executive Departments independent of the Executive will. I expect him, therefore, to unite with me in lifting these men from their abject and slavish posture at the footstool of imperial power. I want him to unite with me in so ordering our affairs that there shall at no time hereafter be a recurrence of such scandalous exhibitions as the country has been compelled to witness at Philadelphia, where a political convention was manipulated and engineered by high functionaries of this Government in forming a part of the very Cabinet of the President. I want him to vote with me so as to make it impossible hereafter that the world shall witness another royal progress like the last, graced by the attendance of Cabinet ministers, and illustrated, too, by sometimes maudlin public utterances from them.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I have only to say, in addition to what I have already remarked, that there are other objections to this bill, which I will endeavor to correct if I am allowed the privilege by such amendments as have suggested themselves to me.

I trust the gentleman from New York will allow me this opportunity. I take his silence for consent, and with that understanding I will not detain the House any longer.

Mr. HALE. I hope the gentleman will infer nothing from my silence. It is important that this bill should be brought to a vote this afternoon.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I give notice then to the gentleman from New York that if my amendment to the first section prevails, a corresponding amendment will be needed and offered by me for the second one.

The third section also I shall ask to change, because it reenacts a constitutional provision in very terms, while it omits to provide that it shall be the duty of the President to nominate at the next session when he has filled a vacancy during the recess. I shall ask leave also to renew the insertion of the second section of the bill, now pending in the House, providing that in no case where a party has been once rejected by the Senate, shall he be renominated or replaced or allowed to perform any of the functions of the office for which he has been refused.

And with these remarks, as promised, I submit my pending proposition to the House.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I would not rise for the purpose of discussing this bill, and should occupy no time of the House in such discussion were it not highly probable that owing to circumstances beyond my control, unless the vote is taken this afternoon I shall not be able to be in my seat when the yeas and nays are called.

Mr. Speaker, I am decidedly in favor of the bill as it came from the Senate; and I am as decidedly opposed to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WILLIAMS.] I oppose the amendment not so much upon constitutional grounds, despite the authority of Madison, as upon the grounds of expediency and policy; on the ground of expediency, because I believe that if the amendment is inserted the measure will be lost. As has been said on the floor of this House over and over again, the three departments of the Government are independent of each other—the legislative, the executive, and the judicial. The legislative department is independent of the executive, except so far as the veto may control their action. The executive department is independent of the legislative department, except so far as the action of the Senate upon appointments is concerned. Now, these exceptions, which like all exceptions must be construed strictly, were placed in the Constitution by our fathers for wise and wholesome purposes; and I believe they should in no instance be departed from. In the one instance they prevent hasty, improvident, and unconstitutional legislation. In the other they prevent the appointment of weak or dishonest men to office. In all other respects the coordinate branches of Government are independent of each other.

Now, sir, in regard to the power of removal, the Constitution is silent upon the question. It does not say that it shall be given to the President or to the President and the Senate. It merely says that all appointments shall be made by the President by and with the approval of the Senate. I admit, with my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] that as a general proposition the power of removal is incident to the power of appointment. But I deny that it necessarily follows that the power of removal is restricted to the appointing power. I have no doubt that Congress has the supreme power to control the entire subject of removal.

When the proposition was first before the House in the bill presented by my friend [Mr. WILLIAMS] the other day, at first it met with my approval. I then deemed it to be necessary for the safety of the Government, and even for the preservation of the principles of liberty, that the heads of the Executive Departments should only be removed by and with the approval and consent of the Senate. I looked upon it without any reference to the present condition of the country, without any reference to any party. I have tried to look upon it in no partisan spirit, but so far as I could as a statesman, and after giving it very mature reflection, (and I have devoted to the subject the best power of my mind,) I now believe that it is safer for the Government, and more in accordance with our theory of an independent executive, to allow the President alone to remove the heads of the Departments, instead of calling upon the Senate for its consent.

Sir, the President of the United States is the executive head of the nation. The acts of the Executive and of the heads of the Departments are the acts of the President, and his only; for those acts he alone is responsible to the country. The heads of Departments are the confidential agents of the President, or, if gentlemen prefer the nomenclature of John Randolph, they are his chief clerks. The theory of the Constitution is that the President, being the executive head of the nation, controls and manages personally all the affairs of his department. But that has become practically impossible. The President cannot with his own hands perform all the duties incident to his department. He cannot with his own eyes overlook all the details of our foreign and domestic relations, and it became necessary to systematize and subdivide, and hence the various Departments were established. And for more efficiency each was provided with a head called a Secretary. To whom, sir, are those heads of Departments responsible? To Congress or the people primarily? No, sir; to the President, and the President alone. They exercise the duties of their Departments under the direction, will, and control of the President, and their acts are the acts of the President. They are, as was well said in the debate of 1798, the "extra eyes and the extra arms of the President," and they are responsible to him alone. They have by custom come to be called his "constitutional advisers;" but there is nothing in the Constitution that makes them such; there is nothing in the law that makes them such. But usually, being men of great ability, and in intimate communication and confidential relations with the President, they, by reason of their knowledge of the duties of their respective Departments, become, so to speak, his advisers. But he is not obliged to call upon them: he may consult with whom he pleases.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it has been said, and said with a great deal of feeling, that in consequence of permitting the President to select and dismiss at his pleasure the members of his Cabinet, as they are called, or the heads of the Departments, the Secretaries become merely the tools of the President, exercising no manly judgment upon the affairs of the nation. With a bad or weak man it may possibly be so; but it is by no means probable; and I believe that an able and wicked Secretary would have greater power to gratify an unhallowed ambition and to injure the country by making the consent of the Senate necessary for his removal. If such consent be required, it will, in my judgment, be dangerous to the country, because it will weaken and divide the Administration; it will divide the power charged with the execution of the laws. Look, for instance, at the recent rebellion. Suppose that during the late conflict the Secretary of War had entertained the idea that secession might be proper, and instead of managing his affairs of his Department in such an able manner as to gain for himself the affection of our whole loyal people and the plaudits of the civilized world, had preserved a masterly inactivity, doing nothing treasonable, but being simply inefficient, nothing but disaster and ruin would have resulted to the country. Sir, in a case like that, where the "confidential adviser" or agent of the President is found not to be executing his will under the law ought not the President to have the power to displace him? Does not the safety of the country demand that the President should possess such power?

Gentlemen here seem to proceed upon the ground that everybody is bad; that human nature is necessarily corrupt; and that when a man gets into official position he will degrade himself by the commission of mean and dishonest acts. Sir, I believe that human nature partakes in some measure of the essence of divinity; that man into whom God breathed the breath of life has still about him something of the impress of God. I believe that, whether in high or low position, there is something of honesty left in the world. I know that men often are bad; but I cannot admit that because a man is in power he is necessarily corrupt.

My position in relation to the present Administration is well known. It is well known that the views of the Executive do not agree with my views; and I utter these sentiments merely as the honest and earnest conviction of my judgment, looking to the good of the country. I look upon the question in a broader than a partisan light. I regard it as a question not merely for the present day, but for the great future, when this country shall be covered by a hundred million people. Backed as we now are by a triumphant majority of the people, right as we are in the great body of measures that we are taking to carry out the expressed will of the people, I warn gentlemen not to be too hasty. Let us not legislate in a spirit of partisanship. Let us not legislate for to-day alone, when we are flushed with victory and more or less disturbed by passion; but in the exercise of a pure, clear judgment, befitting statesmen, a judgment that rises above the passions of the hour and the wants of the moment, let us legislate for the great future.

I believe, sir, that as a matter of policy this amendment should not prevail. Its constitutionality I admit; but its expediency and propriety I deny.

Mr. DONNELLY. I move to amend the bill by adding to the third section the following:

Provided, however, That no vacancy shall be held to have happened during the recess of the Senate if the incumbent of the office was in the exercise of the duties of the office upon the day on which Congress convened; but in such case the person holding such office shall continue to retain and exercise the same until his successor is confirmed by the Senate or until he is removed in accordance with the provisions of this act.

Mr. Speaker, I will ask the attention of the House for a few moments while I explain the purpose of this amendment. It is intended to cover a peculiar class of cases, some of which have arisen in my State and district.

It is, sir, a well-known fact that it was the intention of the framers of the Constitution that the appointing power should not be exercised by the President alone, but by the President and the Senate acting conjointly. So jealous were they of the exercise of this great power by any one man, and so deep was the impression upon their minds made by the fierce struggle through which they had passed against the despotic power of the Government of England, that they even provided in that Constitution the appointment of many of these officers might, should the interests of the country require it, be entirely removed from the President. In every case occurring while the Senate was in session it was enjoined the appointment should be made jointly by the President and the Senate. But it was seen that there would necessarily occur cases of vacancy during the recess of the Senate, when of course the judgment of that body could not be brought to bear upon the case and it was necessary to provide for such an emergency and vest the power of temporarily filling the place in the hands of the President. And the Constitution accordingly provided that where vacancies happen during the recess of the Senate the President may issue his commission, which shall expire at the end of the next session of the Senate. It seems to me nothing could be clearer than the meaning of that portion of the Constitution. The word "happen" is derived from a Teutonic root, which involves the idea of "surprise." Webster defines it as meaning, "to occur accidentally; to fall out; to come without previous expectation." It was clearly the intention of the framers of the Constitution to provide in this section simply for those vacancies which might "happen" by the death, resignation, or misconduct in office. Mr. Hamilton spoke of it as referring to "cases of casual vacancies."

Now, under the practice that has grown up under our Government, it has been assumed by the President that he could actually "create" the vacancy, which by the terms of the Constitution was expected to "happen;" that is to say, that that which was to be a casual act beyond the control of the appointing power could be created by the appointing power. Such a construction, it seems to me, cannot possibly be supported by the language of the Constitution. But great as are the evils which have grown out of this forced construction of the Constitution, this amendment is intended to strike at a still greater perversion of the meaning of the Constitution, a still greater extension of the illegal and unjust practice which has recently arisen.

In my own district the United States assessor, one of the best and most capable officers in the entire revenue service of the United States, was, upon the 6th day of December last, after the convening of the present session of Congress, in the undisputed exercise of the duties of his office, so recognized by the Department, performing all his duties. Subsequent to that date, no misconduct having been alleged against the incumbent, a party appeared with a commission dated on the 16th of November last, and claimed the possession of the office. The assessor holding office by a perfect title—by the appointment of the late President Lincoln—confirmed long since by the Senate, refused to yield up his office until the appointment of his successor was acted upon by the Senate, then in actual session; and he has to this day so refused to yield, and is still in the exercise of the duties of his office. Now, I seek by this amendment to prevent just such cases. I do not seek to attack the right of the President to make removals during the actual recess of the Senate, although, as I said, I do not think such action, however justified by custom, is consistent with the language and intent of the Constitution.

But I desire to prevent this system of removing men from office during the actual session of the Senate upon commissions which may, for aught the incumbent or the Senate knows, be antedated, and may be really made and issued from the Department at Washington while the Senate is in session. If my amendment is adopted and becomes part of the bill it will require that in such cases the party so taking the appointment shall abide the action of the Senate, and that the party who is in possession of the office at the time the Senate convenes shall continue to hold it until his successor is confirmed by the Senate. I do not think there can be any reasonable objection to such a provision. If it is not adopted there is no limit to this power of the President. It is in his power, while we are now deliberating and attempting to set up guards against his power of removal, to issue commissions by the wholesale and date them back to November or July or March, if he chooses, and so remove the remnant of good and faithful men who are yet left in office, and who look to this Congress for protection.

Neither can there be any reason for the course which the Administration seek to pursue: there can be no motive for it. The Senate being actually in session, it is the prerogative of the Senate to judge between the two men—the incumbent and his proposed successor—and I can see no reason why the party holding a commission, received by him after the commencement of the session of Congress, should not abide the action of the Senate. Any other construction will simply tend to do away with the power of the Senate to act upon those cases. I hope, Mr. Speaker, I have given sufficient explanation of the purpose of my amendment and that it will prevail. I feel, at least, that I should be false to many excellent men in my own district and throughout the whole country if I did not make this effort to stay the hand of persecution and usurpation.

Mr. HISE. Mr. Speaker, the few remarks that I intend to submit I have no idea will contain anything particularly interesting to the members of the House. They will be somewhat didactic and elementary.

I believe it is a cardinal principle in political philosophy, as enunciated by Montesquieu and afterward approved and adopted by Madison, that the distribution of the powers of a Government intended to be free into separate and independent departments is necessary in order that free government should be maintained and perpetuated; and that the contrary doctrine of the amalgamation or concentration of all the governmental powers in the hands of one single magistrate or a single department of the Government, whether the officers of that department held their powers for life or a shorter time, and whether it be hereditary or elective, is the very essence of despotism, and any Government based upon such doctrine will, in the absence of the restraints or checks existing by reason of a division of its powers between different and independent departments, as shown by the light of experience and history, end in corrupt, arbitrary, irresponsible, and oppressive misrule, notwithstanding there be a written constitution strictly defining and limiting its powers.

I believe that the framers of the Constitution of the United States, as well as the framers of all our State constitutions, founded the framework of our governments upon the fundamental principle to which I have referred. It was held to be indispensably necessary, in order that government should be free, that there should be this division of its powers among at least three different departments. There is a broad line of distinction between the powers of these branches of the Government, the executive, the legislative, and the judicial. To state it simply, the legislative department makes the laws, the judicial department construes them and determines all contests between individual litigants, and pass upon and apply, as required in cases within their defined and established jurisdiction, all the laws both statutory and fundamental; while the executive department was provided for a distinct and different purpose, as its name imports, and that was to execute the laws as passed by the Legislature and sustained by the judiciary.

The State governments were organized to operate upon the rights of person and property, and to secure civil order and well-regulated liberty among the people. The Federal Government was constituted for a very different purpose. It was designed for the management of what are called national purposes and objects, such as our relations with foreign nations and the preservation of peace between the States. It was, therefore, necessary that all those divisions of power which existed in the State constitutions should be preserved in the Federal Constitution, so as to prevent encroachment by this Government upon the reserved rights of the States.

The framers of the Constitution provided further in the legislative department for a difference in the qualifications of members of the Senate and House of Representatives, with the hope and expectation that there would be more experience, moderation, and wisdom in the body first named than there would perhaps be in the House of Representatives, which, on account of the youth and inexperience of its members and its numerical force, would be more apt to be controlled by partisan passion. But, as is now the case, both branches of Congress might be in the hands of one political party, both interested in practicing partisan abuses, and so power was lodged in the hands of the Executive to operate upon, and to some extent control, the legislative department by means of the veto.

The necessity of maintaining these checks and balances provided by the Constitution in this distribution of powers is shown by the fact of the various acts committed by the legislative department of the Government during the last four, five, or six years. Educated in the school of politics that I have been, it does seem to me that the tendency of those acts has been to set up a government here regardless of the Constitution of the United States.

I refer not only to the exercise of legislative power, which they do not possess, but to the fact that they are legislating so as to cripple and emasculate, if not to destroy, the authority and jurisdiction of the judicial as well as the executive branch of the Government. The bill that is now before the House is intended to destroy the independence of the executive department of the Government. An act has also been introduced into this body in relation to the Supreme Court of the United States, now composed of nine members, and which court has full and plenary authority to decide upon all questions of the constitutionality of any of the laws of Congress; which act is intended virtually to deprive that branch of the Government of its beneficent power and influence in preserving the people of the United States and the State governments from legislative usurpation.

And the jurisdiction of the State courts has been invaded by requiring causes that have been instituted in those courts to be taken away without authority and lodged in the Federal courts, in order to get in illegal defenses that would not be admissible in the State courts. We have seen acts of confiscation, by which the property of the citizen, without any trial or conviction, or adjudication of a court with competent jurisdiction, is attempted to be wrested from him, contrary to the Constitution of the United States. Hence, I hold that the examples furnished and presented by the acts of the present Congress, both done and contemplated, as well as the acts of preceding Congresses show the importance and the necessity of maintaining these checks and balances in our system of Government, both State and Federal.

Now, sir, the executive branch of the Government must necessarily hold all the executive power pertaining to it. You cannot constitutionally strip it of any power that must necessarily be classified as executive, as contradistinguished from judicial or legislative power; and it is only for candid and intelligent men, free from party bias and passion, to look for a moment at any act to be able to decide whether the power involved is legislative, executive, or judicial.

Now, what is the object of constitutional government at all? The object is to prescribe limits, boundaries, and restraints upon the various departments of the Government in which the powers of government are lodged; to say to each Department, "Thus far shalt thou go, and no farther." In regard to the Federal Government, it was considered that there were rights of men and rights and powers of the States that should not be infringed or encroached upon by any majority of the legislative branch of the Government, however great that majority might be. No matter if some reprehensible measure might be carried by the entire body of Congress, yet, if they respect their oaths, they will not be guilty of it, merely because they have the power of numbers, because if they should be guilty of it they would not only violate their oaths, but depart from the principles of sound statesmanship and overthrow and subvert the Constitution of this Government, which, if carried out as now established, will tend to produce all the grand results which my friend from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] could only hope to obtain by claiming that there is an unwritten constitution higher and above the written one.

Now, I insist upon it, that in order to secure the independence of the executive branch of the Government, that it may have the power and efficiency, according to the design of the Constitution, to interpose an effectual check against usurpations upon the part of the legislative branch of the Government, the Executive must have the exclusively executive power of making appointments, with the Senate's concurrence, and of removing all executive officers at his unfettered and unrestricted pleasure. I hold that any intervention upon the part of Congress to fix the tenure of executive officers is an unwarrantable exercise of power, unauthorized by the Constitution. Now, the Constitution is very plain in its terms; we want no more law upon the subject; the fundamental law settles the question; and because it is an executive power the power of appointment and removal is necessarily given to the President of the United States; for the power of removing an executive officer is necessarily an executive power.

The Constitution says the President shall nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint. The word "President" is the nominative to both the verbs, the one that precedes and the one that follows the words "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate." It is the President who nominates; if he does not nominate the Senate cannot act at all. If the President, there being a vacancy, does make a nomination, and the advice and consent of the Senate is asked, then whether the consent be given or refused, if an appointment is made at all it must be made by the President alone, and he is not prohibited from appointing his own nominee notwithstanding the disapproval of the Senate.

The same clause of the Constitution provides that the Congress may by law place the appointment of inferior officers in the heads of Departments and in courts of law. Now, what does any candid, intelligent man understand to be the meaning of that clause of the Constitution in regard to inferior officers? He understands it, and can understand it reasonably, in no other way than as meaning that the authority of Congress to place the appointment of inferior officers in the heads of the Department had reference of course exclusively to those inferior officers who were employed in conducting the business of that Department alone. Does that constitutional provision authorize Congress to vest in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury the power to appoint postmasters, and vice versa, to vest in the Postmaster General the appointment of subordinate officers of the Treasury Department? Surely not.

So, too, in regard to the courts. When Congress is authorized to confer on the courts of law the appointing power it simply means that Congress may by legislative act authorize the different tribunals to appoint the various subordinate officers necessary to aid in the administration of justice. Who can with any show of reason maintain that Congress has the right by law to vest in the hands of the judges the appointment of a Treasury officer—to confer, as is proposed, on the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court the power to appoint the Commissioner of Internal Revenue? By such an act we should bestow on the judicial department of the Government executive power which under the Constitution can be exercised by the executive department only. If you thus strip the executive branch of its legitimate functions, you should at the same time relieve it of the corresponding responsibility.

No intelligent, candid man, unbiased by party zeal or party passions, can believe otherwise than that the Constitution intended that the appointing power to be lodged in the courts should be confined to the subordinate officers of those courts, such as sheriffs, marshals, messengers, clerks, &c., officers necessary to aid in the administration of justice and in the exercise of the powers or functions pertaining to the judicial department.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman from Kentucky allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HISE. It will interrupt me very much indeed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is but a single question, which the gentleman can answer in a word. I wish the gentleman to say whether a marshal is not an executive officer, and whether, under the law which has existed almost from the foundation of this Government, the power to appoint deputy-marshals has not been lodged with the courts.

Mr. HISE. I look upon the office of marshal as similar to the office of sheriff. The marshal is the officer whose duty it is to execute the processes, mesne and final, of the courts, to carry their sentences into execution and to enforce and collect their judgments.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then he is an executive officer.

Mr. HISE. Not necessarily executive. He is the ministerial officer of a court; and I would not deny the authority of Congress to vest the appointment of marshals in the courts of which they are officers; not at all; because I look upon the marshal as a part of the auxiliary force of the judicial department, necessary in order to carry out its judgments and decrees. It is true that the Congress of the United States, by various acts, providing for taking the census, &c., has charged these marshals with executive functions, but improperly in my opinion. I hold that the marshal is a quasi judicial officer—an officer connected with the administration of judicial functions.

Now, what is to be the doctrine? That the President of the United States shall be held responsible for all maladministration in the executive branch of the Government, for all failure to execute the laws. He is the only officer known to the Constitution in whom is lodged the executive power of the Government. To none others is that power confided except as his auxiliaries, adjuncts, aiders, and assistants. The executive head of the Administration is responsible for his subordinates. He is responsible for the heads of the various Departments. He is responsible for the management of the business of those Departments. Being thus responsible, the President necessarily must have the power to remove these subordinates at pleasure. The Senate cannot appoint; the Senate cannot remove. To say that the President shall not remove a high officer is to say that he shall not be removed at all. Thus we have the anomalous condition of things, that an officer of the executive department resists and refuses to execute the commands of his constitutional superior charged with carrying out the laws of Congress; and there is no power of the superior to enforce the obedience of the inferior, or in case of obdurate disobedience to put in his place a faithful and obedient officer! Thus the subordinate is higher than the principal: the inferior sets at defiance his official superior.

By your bill the President is not allowed to remove from office, and by the Constitution the Senate cannot remove, except upon impeachment. Neither, then, alone can remove. We have an Executive elected for four years, and the subordinates appointed by him, unless there is an agreement to remove him or them between the President and Senate, will hold their offices during life, unless by law the term of office should be limited. The Senate alone cannot remove, and you deny that the President alone can do it. Then it depends on the agreement between the President and the Senate whether a corrupt and incompetent official should be removed. Will they agree? They will never agree when the Senate is composed of a large majority of the political enemies of the Executive.

The President cannot remove and the Senate cannot remove, and they cannot agree; what is to be the result of this state of things? Subordinate officers will have paramount authority; they may stand out in defiance of the President, their superior officer. Not only is the Constitution against this condition of things, but it ought to be against it. The President is the man who is to select. He is supposed to be of high and illustrious character, who has been raised to exalted position by the judgment of the people. He is put into the presidential office, charged with all its powers and responsibilities, including the power to remove corrupt and incompetent officers and the power to appoint those who are honest and competent. If you take it from him and give it to the Senate, what is the result? If you give it to him and the Senate conjointly, what is the result? The result will be a dead-lock. If not that result then the executive department will be domineered over and controlled in regard to appointments by the Senate, and the Senate will become the dispenser of all the Government patronage pertaining to the executive branch of the Government and which does and of right ought to be within the power and control of the executive head. I would not wrest this power from the President and place it in the Senate, because it would tend to destroy all subordination and unity of design and action so necessary to the independence and efficiency of the executive branch of the Government, and tend to the absorption and consolidation of all the powers of Government by Congress, and thus diminish, if not destroy, the conservative elements in our political system, intended to protect from encroachment the right of the States and the liberty of the citizen.

Under this bill the President will only have the right of suspension. He can suspend the officer for a short time—while his case is to be presented to the Senate for trial; and as there are many thousands of officers employed in all the various branches of the civil service of the Government, and consequently cases of corruption and incompetency constantly being exhibited requiring removals and reappointments, then without the power of removal in the hands of the President, the public interest would be continually jeopardized; or otherwise, if the President's authority be limited to temporary suspension, until the Senate should try each case upon its own merits upon charges and proof of incompetency or official corruption. In such case that august body, the Senate of the United States, would resolve itself into a petty partisan court, and all its time be taken up in trying hundreds, perhaps thousands, of petty cases of imputed delinquency of executive officers, and the President of the United States, the chief executive head of a great Government, would degenerate into a public prosecutor of thousands of petty officers for petty offenses. Results such as these and others still more—

Mr. STEVENS. I ask leave to move the following amendment:

And in no case shall any person who has been nominated by the President for any office below that of ambassador and rejected by the Senate, or on whose nomination that body has failed or declined to act in the way of consent or refusal, be appointed for any office of the United States for the space of one year after such rejection. When nominations have been made and which have been or shall be rejected, all acts done in making such nominations, or which may be done by the nominee, so far as the removal and appointment of subordinates is concerned, shall be considered null and void.

Mr. HALE. I object.

Mr. STEVENS. I give notice, then, I shall offer the amendment when it is in order, and I hope the previous question will not be seconded until I have that opportunity.

Mr. HALE. I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. The amendment then will be regarded as pending.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, the bill now under consideration is either useful and ought to be passed for the benefit of those who have been persecuted for the past year, or it is pernicious. If it cannot be made a useful bill by way of punishment and reproof and by way of reparation to those who for their loyalty have been persecuted, then perhaps the bill had better stand as it is.

There is no probability now that the same occurrences will be repeated. If we had passed this law two years ago, so as to have prevented what has already taken place, there would have been some sense in it in a party as well as in a political point of view. We did not do it; we suffered the President to go on against the ordinary custom of the country and make removals for the purpose of creating a party; I say against the custom of the country, for although I recognize the right and the propriety of an incoming Executive to change his agents so as to make all of them conform to his views in carrying out the principles upon which he was elected, yet I do not recognize the right, after having been elected upon certain issues or principles, to take these offices and pervert them. I do not recognize his right to build up a party by corrupting those who are now in power for the purpose of destroying the very party and the very principles that elected him. I say it is dishonest and corrupt, and in my judgment quite sufficient cause for impeachment.

Now, sir, this bill as it stands at present only prevents the future repetition of things of this kind; it does not restore matters to what they were, nor punish his coconspirators in this work. If you do not do this, what do you do? You confirm these very men in the office in which he has placed them. You make them profit—them or some others—by his acts. You punish those who were loyal to the country, and you prevent any man from ever again hoping that he will be protected by the party in power from this kind of usurpation.

Now, my amendment provides that whenever the Senate shall fail to confirm the nomination, the person nominated shall hold no office under the President for the space of one year. It is so guarded that it can affect nobody except those who have been appointed since we were here before. Is not that right in two points of view? Is it not right as a punishment for those who have deserted their principles, their friends, and their party; and is it not right because it presumes that the Senate had examined them and found them unfit for office? I submit that it takes at least a year to wash clean a polluted politician, and hence that limit is small enough.

Now, what objection is there to it? Some gentlemen say, "Why, can you appoint to office?" No; I am not saying we do appoint to office; but I claim that we may declare that these men have never been out of office. If you cannot declare that, your whole bill is a shameful violation of the Constitution. This bill is founded only upon the ground that the true meaning of the Constitution from the outset was that the President, of himself, had no power to create a vacancy such as the present incumbent has been doing. If he has done it, he has done it in violation of the Constitution. If the Constitution allowed him to do it, I ask the learned gentleman from New York upon what authority he is acting here? He is not, I hope, changing the Constitution by this simple act of his.

Mr. HALE. I will endeavor to answer the question very fully, and I trust to the satisfaction of the gentleman, when I take the floor. I will then show upon what ground I put it.

Mr. STEVENS. I have no doubt the gentleman will put it on the most plausible ground, as he always does, and with eminent ability. I cannot see how this act is possibly constitutional unless we have a right to declare that the President in making these appointments was acting outside of the Constitution. If we say to the President, "You have no right to make these removals without the consent of the Senate," why do we say it? Because the Constitution says it. So we construe it. Suppose the construction has been erroneous for the last seventy years, that does not change the Constitution. There has been no legislative construction of it in this respect. We are now for the first time putting a legislative construction upon it. We therefore have a clear right to say that everything done between the time of the removal of these men and the present, or the time of their reinstatement, was void, being done in violation of the Constitution, and that these men shall be considered as still in office precisely as they were before, instead of being sacrificed for their fidelity and their places being filled by the most filthy reptiles that ever crawled into office.

I trust that the amendment will prevail. I shall also vote for the amendment of my colleague, [Mr. WILLIAMS.] If they prevail then I can vote for the bill on constitutional grounds; if they fail I should deem myself violating my oath to support the Constitution if I voted for the bill, and shall therefore certainly vote against it.

But I have not risen to occupy much time, only to state as distinctly as I could my views of the question, and I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Illinois; [Mr. BAKER.]

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a very few remarks in support of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] which consists in striking out of the text of the bill these words: "excepting the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, and of the Interior, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General," the effect of which will be that the Senate must concur in the removal, as in the appointment of these Cabinet officers. I favor this proposition for the following reasons:

1. Now is the only opportunity likely ever to arise when it will be practicable to make this reformation. If there be a good in it, now is probably the solitary occasion on which we shall ever be able to attain that good. On the contrary, if the reform in this particular does not work well it will obviously be an easy matter to go back to the old method. From this state of the case I derive a strong argument in favor of the proposed amendment.

2. This amendment simply proposes to apply to heads of Departments the general principle that both branches of the appointing power shall concur in the removal of an officer—a sound principle to the whole extent, if sound at all.

3. I should rather expect much good from this change. The relation of the Cabinet to the President, as the matter now stands, is substantially the same as the relation subsisting between the British sovereign and her council. Both are officers holding by tenures at the will of their superior. It is very plain, on general principles of human nature, that such a relation is inimical to the giving of that perfectly free and independent advice which looks only to the public good, and is calculated on the other hand to promote a facile compliance with the will of the superior. Thus the very end of advisory counsel—truth elicited by truth asserted without fear or favor—is continually in danger of being defeated. This I do not say is the necessary result but it is the permanent tendency of the system. English history in too many instances shows that the counselors of the Crown, especially when worn by a strong-willed and perverse monarch, have only confirmed the sovereign in his evil courses, and sought to buttress up his abuses of power by gross perversions of constitution and law.

The like, or something similar, I apprehend, may occur, if indeed it has not in some measure already occurred, in the administration of our own Government, if we continue to copy in this important respect the example of Great Britain. The President should be surrounded by a body of measurably independent counselors in order that we may have the best guarantee that their counsel may be upright, disinterested, and valuable to the highest attainable degree. In my opinion the reform will work admirably. I think it is one of the most needed and most important changes this Congress can make; and I do earnestly hope the amendment may be adopted.

The suggestion that if deprived of absolute control over the removal of his Cabinet, the President will call to his aid what has been termed an irresponsible "Kitchen Cabinet," strikes me with little force. Under the proposed change the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, as now, would call around him his most able personal and political friends. Surely, just, manly, and proper fidelity to him would not be impaired but rather fortified by the circumstance that they did not hold their places subject to his absolute power to dismiss them at any moment. The best and highest forms of friendship and fidelity are not the results of absolute authority in the one party and absolute dependence in the other.

It is not fit, in my judgment, that an American officer of high grade should occupy a position of such absolute dependence on the will of another. The idea is European, not American. It is appropriate to monarchical systems, where the highest officers of the court are but creatures of the Crown. It appears to me utterly inappropriate in a free Republic, and I hope we shall make an end of it.

Mr. HALE. I now move the previous question on the bill and the pending amendments; but before pressing that motion I will yield for a moment to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAMS] to offer the amendment of which he has given notice.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I offer the amendment, which is to come in after line five of section three.

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent the amendment can be entertained at this time, to be voted on in its order. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the first amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania prevails, a similar amendment will be needed in the second section. I offer that amendment if there be no objection.

No objection was made, and the amendment was entertained.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, I shall endeavor to be very brief in what I have to say upon this bill; but before I proceed I desire to ask leave of absence after to-day in consequence of illness in my family.

No objection was made, and the leave of absence was granted.

Mr. HALE. Two conflicting theories on the subject of the power of removal from office have been propounded in this House, one of them by the gentleman from Ohio, who first spoke this morning, [Mr. FINCK,] founded on the grave and venerable authority of Madison, that the power of removal by force of the Constitution rests in the President alone as the chief executive officer of the Government, and that no power exists in Congress to change or transfer that power; the other is the theory claimed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAMS] and by the other gentleman from Pennsylvania who recently addressed the House, [Mr. STEVENS,] that by force of the Constitution the power of removal rests only in the President jointly with the Senate in the same manner in which the power of appointment is given.

This bill is based upon neither of those propositions, but in contradiction of both. Neither theory, I undertake to say, can be maintained logically from the Constitution itself. Neither theory, notwithstanding the eminent authorities that have been cited on both sides, can be sustained by judicial construction. Neither theory can be maintained by legislative construction. But the true theory, sustained by the best and ablest writers on the Constitution, sustained by judicial authority, sustained by the consistent and unvarying course of legislative action, puts the power of removal from office on the ground on which this bill puts it; which is, that where the Constitution is silent, where it does not in express terms provide for the manner in which officers may be removed, it does not, as a matter of logical conclusion, devolve either upon the President alone or upon the President jointly with the Senate, but that it is a case to be supplied by legislation. The power to create offices vested in the legislative department assumes and implies necessarily a power also to fix the characteristics of the office, its nature, its duties, its duration, and its tenure. This is no new proposition. It was avowed in the earlier writings of Mr. Madison, although he afterward, in the constitutional debates, abandoned that ground and occupied the one which has been maintained to-day by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINCK] and the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. HISE.]

In Nos. 38 and 48 of the Federalist, Mr. Madison certainly uses language which can have no other construction than this view of the power of the Legislature to fix the tenure of office. A difference of opinion arose early upon this very question. Hamilton, in the 77th number of the Federalist, took the ground now occupied by the two gentlemen from Pennsylvania, that the power of removal must rest in the same hands as the power of appointment—that is with the President and the Senate. The question came up for debate in the First Congress upon a bill establishing the office of Secretary of Foreign Affairs in 1789. I undertake to say that those who maintain that that Congress fixed and established the principle that the Constitution vested the power of removal in the President alone labor under a misapprehension. The debate took a wide range and was engaged in by many of the strongest and ablest men of that day. The question was simply whether the officer to be created, the Secretary of Foreign Affairs, should be removable by the Senate alone or by the President alone, or by the conjoint action of the President and the Senate.

Mr. Madison, in the early stages of the discussion, based the argument rather on the ground of convenience and propriety than upon that of constitutional right. But before the close of the debate he announced the broad ground that by force of the Constitution the power must vest necessarily in the President alone; that he as the supreme executive head of the nation must have the power of removal from office.

But Mr. Madison was not the only advocate of the provision in that bill providing that the Secretary should be removable at the will of the President. Other gentlemen advocated it on the ground that it was matter of propriety; that the Secretary of Foreign Affairs was in fact the chief clerk, the confidential adviser of the President, and therefore there was eminent fitness that he at least should be removable at the will of the President alone. Among the gentlemen who voted for retaining this clause in the bill, a large majority of those who spoke upon the question put it upon the ground of expediency only, and not upon that of constitutional rights. Among the names of those who voted in the affirmative upon the question of retaining the power of removal in the President was at least one gentleman, who in the debate stood expressly committed to the idea that the Constitution did not of itself confine the power to the President. He announced and maintained that doctrine in some very pertinent and forcible remarks. I refer to Mr. Livermore, of New Hampshire.

That debate, therefore, and that first vote of Congress did not determine anything upon this question. It did not make a legislative construction upon the subject of the power of the President to remove; although several different writers since that time, and some of them writers of distinction, have fallen into the mistake, while even the courts have fallen into a different mistake concerning that debate. That debate alone unless followed by some action certainly could not be held to give a controlling legislative construction to this section of the Constitution.

In different laws, which I will not now enumerate, creating heads of different Departments and subordinate officers, passed from time to time from that period down to this, and I may say, I believe, in every decade at least of our existence as a nation, this matter has been passed upon by Congress. And how? Not by giving a legislative construction as to what the Constitution implies may be done in regard to removals from office, but by granting the express power to the President to remove; a thing which would be wholly needless if the power was already in the Constitution itself. Legislative construction in order to be binding must be in the nature of prescription; it must be uniform and consistent, always recognizing the same doctrine of the Constitution.

Now, so far is this from being the case, that in addition to the instances to which I have referred, wherein the statutes the express power was given to the President to remove without the concurrence of the Senate, at least one case has met the approval of Congress, and without question upon that point; it was made the subject of a very rigid and searching debate; and the power of removal was expressly confined to the President, with the approval and consent of the Senate. In the act of February, 1863, creating the Bureau of the Currency, it was expressly provided that the Comptroller of the Currency should be removable only by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Instead, then, of finding a uniform course of precedent of legislative construction in favor of this constitutional power, the whole course of legislative precedent is against it, and precisely in favor of the doctrine upon which this bill is based, that the Constitution being silent it is a proper subject of legislative action to determine the tenure of these offices which the legislative power creates.

This has been recognized, too, by the courts. I refer to the case which was read this morning by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FINCK,] and I call his attention and the attention of the House to the manner in which the Supreme Court decided this question. The case cited by him is the case of ex parte Hennen, 13 and 14 Peters. This very opinion contains one erroneous expression as to the nature of the debate of 1789; but that is immaterial to the case. It certainly gives the true doctrine, as the court understood it, in regard to the construction of the Constitution in this respect.

Mr. Justice Thompson, in delivering the opinion of the court, says:

"In the absence of all constitutional provision or statutory regulation"

Mark the words; they are such as never could have been employed except upon the idea that "statutory regulation" was admissible under the Constitution—

"In the absence of all constitutional provision or statutory regulation, it would seem to be a sound and necessary rule to consider the power of removal as incident to the power of appointment. This power of removal from office was a subject much disputed, and upon which a great diversity of opinion was entertained in the early history of the Government. This related, however, to the power of the President to remove officers appointed with the concurrence of the Senate; and the great question was, whether the removal was to be by the President alone or with the concurrence of the Senate, both constituting the appointing power. No one denied."

In this Justice Thompson was in error, for Mr. Madison denied it; but so far as regards the decision of Congress it was undoubtedly true that Congress did not deny it—

"No one denied the power of the President and Senate jointly to remove where the tenure of the office was not fixed by the Constitution; which was a full recognition of the principle that the power of removal was incident to the power of appointment."

There is the solemn declaration of the Supreme Court upon this point. It is explicit and full, covering the whole doctrine for which I now contend. I cannot occupy further time in the discussion of this question of power. The argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAMS] on this subject, presented some weeks ago, seemed to me entirely conclusive on this point, although I differ with him in the extent to which he now seems disposed to carry the construction of the constitutional power. If any weight can be attached to the declarations of the judiciary and to the action of Congress from 1789 down to 1863, if we are not prepared to stultify and nullify the action of Congress upon these topics in the different directions I have pointed out, then I think there can be no question that we are right to-day in saying that this is a power of legislation which the Constitution has left with us, and that all we have to do is to consider the expediency of its exercise and the best mode of exerting it to secure the desired ends.

Now, sir, speaking for myself alone, I wish to say in all frankness and candor that I advocate this bill as a proper measure of permanent legislation for the country. I believe it to be desirable, not because the President of the United States is to-day found in a position hostile to the large majority of this House; not for the reason that the President to-day seems to be attached to a political party to which I certainly do not belong. I always have repudiated, and always will repudiate, the idea of changing the permanent legislation of the country for the purpose of remedying a purely temporary evil. I believe that by pursuing that practice, toward which the arguments of many gentlemen on this side of the House seem to point so often, I may say so constantly, we shall be led into fatal mistakes. The bill which is before us to-day proposes what I believe to be a proper, just, reasonable course of action, applicable as well to the hereafter as to to-day. And the present relation of parties—the fact that a President elected by one party finds himself abandoning that party and acting in opposition to his former political friends—may perhaps furnish an illustration of the propriety of such legislation, although it would not of itself be for me a conclusive argument in its favor. I refer, therefore, to the circumstances of to-day only by way of illustration; and I submit that, taking these circumstances in view, and conceding if gentlemen wish the entire good faith of everybody, the provisions of this bill are such only as are desirable and appropriate, and cannot be considered as derogating from the proper degree of executive power.

This bill does not, as gentlemen on the other side would seem to argue, prevent the displacement of an incompetent and dishonest officer. Whenever an officer is found in default, incompetent, unworthy, ample provision is made for his suspension until the question of his removal may be submitted to the Senate, and for his removal, after proper examination, by the same power which concurred in his appointment. There is no difficulty in this case. All the power of suspension, all the power of getting rid of unworthy officers which exists to-day in the Government, either in the President alone or in the President and in the Senate, is preserved by this bill. The only change in that respect is this: instead of the removal being positive by the President, the officer is debarred from the exercise of his duties and the receipt of his pay until the two constitutional bodies agree whether he ought to be removed or not.

Nor does it interfere with the tenure of office; in other words, it does not extend the constitutional term of any office. It contains a provision expressly on that point.

Mr. HISE rose.

Mr. HALE. I must be excused, as my time is so short, from yielding any further.

Mr. Speaker, I was remarking this bill does not extend the tenure of office. It leaves the law as it is now as to the expiration by legal limitation. Most of these officers are appointed for a definite term of years and their office will expire as before.

Now, a single word as to the different amendments which have been proposed to this bill. An amendment has been moved by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAMS] in regard to the exception of its application to Cabinet officers. Another amendment has been moved to the third section, the nature of which I will not now stop to specify. Another amendment is proposed by the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DONNELLY;] and the fourth by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. As to all these amendments I wish to say preliminarily one thing: at least two, and I think three, have been submitted to the House in another form and passed upon. By decided and emphatic votes the House has rejected the amendments now proposed. One of them has been submitted in the Senate. I do not know whether the others have arrived at that importance. One was moved in the Senate and discussed at length, and rejected by a vote of two to one.

I ask gentlemen in the House who are anxious to make this bill as they term it more stringent, more sweeping, to consider on thing. We have arrived at the last month of the session, and little time remains for us to act. Just as certain as we adopt the amendments proposed the result will be we will fail to enact this into a law. We have to anticipate, if this is adopted, a veto. If the amendments are adopted the bill will go back to the Senate, where debate is unlimited, to compel it to pass upon questions it has already decided. It has passed at least upon one of them by a decided vote. Will gentlemen then tell me what probability there is time will remain for action after the veto? What reason have they to suppose there will be time enough to pass it over the veto in that body?

I know gentlemen here act on the principle that if they cannot have all they ask they will take nothing. I submit that is not wise or prudent action. The true doctrine should be if they cannot get all they want to take the best they can get. I am willing to act on that principle; and to-day I am not so strenuous for this bill. If in the judgment of the Senate and the House it should include the Cabinet I will vote for it in that form. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAMS] has made a plausible argument for putting them upon the same footing as all other officers. If his constitutional construction is correct the House is inconsistent in excepting them. If he is right the Constitution gives the power of removal to the President and Senate. I believe the better opinion, the larger share of sentiment among intelligent and patriotic statesmen, is that it is wiser to leave the Cabinet in that position where they have been placed by constitutional power, not by constitutional enactment, but by Congress; the legal construction beginning with the First Congress in 1789, and continuing to this day, that those officers were the confidential advisers of the President. That being so, I think it is wise for us to leave them as they are. So far as argument in this House is concerned, it is res adjudicata.

So far as the Senate is concerned it has spoken most emphatically upon it, and there is no possible hope of passing such a bill through that body over an executive veto.

As to the amendment proposed by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] I will not go over the ground again. The same provision was offered by him to a former bill, and was condemned by this House by a vote of more than six to one; and I have failed to hear any argument from him to-day which in my judgment will satisfy the House that it committed a great error in that decision.

One word as to the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DONNELLY,] I have no time to examine or consider that point perhaps with the care it deserves, but it seems to me that his amendment is wholly unnecessary, for the reason that it must, after all, turn upon a pure question of constitutional construction, namely, When does the appointment of an officer take effect? I think it will not be found under the other provisions of this bill to be a necessary provision. If it is necessary, and if it means to change the rule as to when an appointee's term begins or his appointment takes effect, then it is not a subject of legislation, but of constitutional provision, and was directly adjudged in the case of Marbury vs. Madison, that the appointment took effect on the final passage of all the papers and the signing of the commission. That being so, I do not see how the gentleman's proposition, to make the question whether a vacancy exists determinable upon the question whether the incumbent is actually in possession of the office or not, can be admissible.

Mr. DONNELLY. I desire to ask the gentleman a single question: whether it will not be well for Congress by such a declaration as this to prevent the practice which has grown up from being continued? I have been informed by one of the members from Kentucky, that in his district he knows a case where the party was confirmed on the 16th of the present month, on a commission dated back to the middle of November.

Mr. HALE. Let me say to the gentleman that in my judgment if such a case exists it is a gross and papable infraction of the Constitution, and I do not see that this bill can remedy it in the least. The thing itself is utterly void, for no power certainly exists in the President to make an appointment to office merely by dating back the time of the appointment. It is simply an attempted fraud on the Constitution, and one which certainly cannot exist when the fact is brought to light.

A MEMBER. Is it not ground for impeachment?

Mr. HALE. Yes, possible ground for impeachment. I am very happy if any of my friends have found a tangible ground which may seem to justify such a measure.

Mr. Speaker, I appeal to the House once more: if we desire in good faith to pass a bill which shall stand the test of the courts, which shall be within the limits of the Constitution, and do it during this session, I am persuaded that our only way is to pass this bill as it comes from the Senate. Just as surely as it is sent back there for the discussion of amendments, especially those which that body has already rejected—

Mr. WILLIAMS. I rise to a question of order: whether it is in order for the gentleman to refer to the probable action of the Senate and say this should be passed, and we should defer to their will.

The SPEAKER. He could not refer specifically to the past action of the Senate; that would not be within the rule. Each House must act independently.

Mr. HALE. I understand the rule, and I am very confident I have not transgressed it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not aware that the gentleman has transgressed it; he was in conversation at the time, and did not quite hear what the gentleman said.

Mr. HALE. I was stating the probable result of a difference of opinion between the two Houses and the executive branch.

The SPEAKER. That is within the legitimate province of debate.

Mr. HALE. I have no words of menace or anything that any fair construction can possibly determine in that direction. I have appealed to the House to take a practical course, one that will probably tend toward attaining the end which we all on this side of the House claim and seem to desire. I trust this bill may be passed and without amendment.

I will only add that this is precisely the bill reported by the joint Committee on Reconstruction, with the addition of certain penal sections made in the Senate, to which no objection has been made there or here, which were suggested in this House on the pendency of the bill introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and finally withdrawn or passed over with the idea that they might perhaps be made the subject of an independent bill. They are now attached to this bill, and I hope the whole will be adopted.

The SPEAKER. Debate upon this bill and the pending amendments is exhausted, and the House will proceed to act upon them under the operation of the previous question.

The question being upon Mr. WILLIAMS' first amendment, it was read as follows:

On lines three, four, and five, of section one, strike out the following:

Excepting the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, and of the Interior, and the Postmaster General, and Attorney General.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Upon that amendment I demand the yeas and nays; and I call for tellers upon the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WILLIAMS and HALE were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported twenty-six in the affirmative.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 76, nays 78, not voting 86; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baxter, Beaman, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Delano, Deming, Donnelly, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Garfield, Grinnell, Abner C.

Hubbard, Julian, Kelley, Kelso, Koontz, William Lawrence, Loan, Lynch, McClurg, McKee, McKuer, Mercer, Morrill, Moulton, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Plants, Price, Rollins, Sawyer, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sloan, Spalding, Stevens, Stokes, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—76.

YAYS—Messrs. Alley, Ancona, Delos R. Ashley, Baldwin, Banks, Bergen, Boyer, Bundy, Campbell, Cooper, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Denison, Driggs, Eldridge, Farquhar, Ferry, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Griswold, Hale, Aaron Harding, Harris, Hawkins, Hise, Hogan, Holmes, Hooper, Chester D. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James R. Hubbell, Humphrey, Hunter, Ingersoll, Kasson, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, Le Blond, Leftwich, Longyear, Marshall, Marston, Marvin, Maynard, Moorhead, Niblack, Noell, Phelps, Pomeroy, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Ritter, Ross, Schenck, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Stilwell, Strouse, Taber, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Nelson Taylor, Francis Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Burt Van Horn, Andrew H. Ward, Warner, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Winfield, and Woodbridge—78.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Arnell, Barker, Benjamin, Blow, Brandegee, Chanler, Culver, Defrees, Dixon, Dodge, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Asahel W. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, Hulburd, Jenckes, Jones, Kerr, Latham, McCullough, McIndoe, Miller, Morris, Myers, Newell, Nicholson, Radford, William H. Randall, Rogers, Rousseau, Starr, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Hamilton Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, and Wright—36.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. NIBLACK stated that Mr. KERR was detained from the House by indisposition.

Mr. O'NEILL stated that Mr. THAYER was still absent from the House in consequence of indisposition in his family.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. HALE. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was disagreed to; and to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. HILL. I demand the yeas and nays upon that motion.

Mr. HALE. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. GARFIELD. Since that amendment has failed I withdraw the similar amendment which I offered to the second section.

The next amendment was Mr. WILLIAMS' amendment, to insert in the third section, line six, after the word "thereafter," the following:

That whenever a vacancy in any office happening during a recess of the Senate may have been filled up by the President in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution, by granting a commission to expire at the end of their next session, it shall be the duty of the President to make a nomination for said office before the end of the next ensuing session of that body.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is already provided for in the bill.

The question was taken; and there were—aye twenty-six; noes not counted.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

The question recurred upon the amendment offered by Mr. DONNELLY, to add to section three the following proviso:

Provided, however, That no vacancy shall be held to have happened during the recess of the Senate if the incumbent of the office was in the exercise of the duties of the office upon the day on which Congress convened, but, in such case, the person holding such office shall continue to retain and exercise the same until his successor is confirmed by the Senate, or until he is suspended in accordance with the provisions of this act.

The question was taken; and there were—aye 44, noes 79.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

The question recurred on the last amendment, offered by Mr. STEVENS, to insert the following at the end of section eight:

And in no case shall any person who has been nominated by the President for any office below that of ambassador and been rejected by the Senate, or on whose nomination that body has failed or declined to act in the way of consent or refusal, be appointed for any office of the United States for the space of one year after such rejection. When nominations have been made below the grade of foreign minister, and which have been, or shall be rejected, all acts done in making such nomination or which may be done by the nominee so far as the removal and appointment of subordinates is concerned, shall be considered null and void.

Mr. GRINNELL. I call for a division of that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not see how the gentleman can demand a division of the amendment. The gentleman who offered it has a right to a vote upon it in the form in which he offered it. The gentleman would have a right to ask for a division of a resolution, but to ask for a division of this amendment would be in the nature of moving an amendment to the amendment, which is not in order under the operation of the previous question.

Mr. GRINNELL. I ask the consent of the mover of the amendment to have it divided.

The SPEAKER. That cannot be done now, as the House is acting under the operation of the previous question.

The question recurred upon the amendment of Mr. STEVENS.

Mr. STEVENS. Upon that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 37, nays 118, not voting 35; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baxter, Beaman, Broomall, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Donnelly, Driggs, Farquhar, Grinnell, Abner C. Harding, Henderson, Julian, Kelley, Kelso, Loan, McClurg, McKee, Moorhead, Myers, O'Neill, Pike, Price, Sawyer, Sloan, Stevens, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, James F. Wilson, and Stephen F. Wilson—37.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Ancona, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Bergen, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Boyer, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Campbell, Reader W. Clarke, Cooper, Culom, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Delano, Deming, Denison, Dumont, Eckley, Eggleston, Eldridge, Elliot, Ferry, Finck, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Griswold, Hale, Aaron Harding, Harris, Hart, Hawkins, Hayes, Higby, Hill, Hise, Hogan, Holmes, Hooper, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James R. Hubbell, Humphrey, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kasson, Ketcham, Koontz, Kuykendall, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Le Blond, Leftwich, Longyear, Lynch, Marshall, Marston, Marvin, Maynard, McKuer, Mercer, Morrill, Moulton, Niblack, Noell, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Phelps, Plants, Pomeroy, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Ritter, Rollins, Ross, Schenck, Scofield, Shanklin, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Spalding, Stilwell, Stokes, Strouse, Taber, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Nelson Taylor, Francis Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Andrew H. Ward, Warner, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, Whaley, Williams, Windom, Winfield, and Woodbridge—118.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Arnell, Banks, Barker, Benjamin, Blow, Brandegee, Chanler, Culver, Defrees, Dixon, Dodge, Farnsworth, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, Hulburd, Jones, Kerr, Latham, McCullough, McIndoe, Miller, Morris, Newell, Nicholson, Radford, Rogers, Rousseau, Starr, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Hamilton Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, and Wright—35.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be read a third time.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I rise to a privileged motion.

The SPEAKER. The House is now acting under the previous question upon this bill.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Is it not in order to move to reconsider a vote taken upon an amendment offered to this bill?

The SPEAKER. That would be in order.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Then I move to reconsider the vote by which the House rejected the amendment proposed to this bill by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WILLIAMS.]

The amendment of Mr. WILLIAMS was to strike out of the first section of the bill the following words:

Excepting the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, and of the Interior, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General.

The effect of the amendment, if adopted, would be to take from the President the power to remove any head of a Department without the consent of the Senate.

The question was upon reconsidering the vote by which the amendment had been rejected.

Mr. HALE. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. GARFIELD. Upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LE BLOND. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The question was then taken upon laying the motion to reconsider upon the table, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 69, nays 74, not voting 47; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Ancona, Delos R. Ashley, Baldwin, Banks, Bergen, Bidwell, Campbell, Cooper, Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Deming, Denison, Driggs, Eldridge, Ferry, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Griswold, Hale, Aaron Harding, Hawkins, Hise, Holmes, Hooper, Chester D. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James R. Hubbell, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kasson, Kuykendall, George V. Lawrence, Le Blond, Leftwich, Longyear, Marshall, Marston, Marvin, Maynard, Niblack, Noell, Phelps, Plants, Pomeroy, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, Ritter, Schenck, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Stilwell, Strouse, Taber, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Nelson Taylor, Francis Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Andrew H. Ward, Warner, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Winfield, and Woodbridge—69.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Baker, Beaman, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Broomall, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Delano, Donnelly, Dumont, Eckley, Eggleston, Elliot, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Garfield, Grinnell, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Hill, Hotchkiss, John H. Hubbard, Julian, Kelley, Kelso, Koontz, William Lawrence, Loan, Lynch, McClurg, McKee, McKuer, Mercer, Moorhead, Morrill, Moulton, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Price, Rollins, Sawyer, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sloan, Spalding, Stevens, Stokes, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, and James F. Wilson—74.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Barker, Baxter, Benjamin, Blow, Boyer, Brandegee, Bundy, Chanler, Culver, Darling, Defrees, Dixon, Dodge, Harris, Hogan, Asahel W. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Jones, Kerr, Ketcham, Laffin, Latham, McCullough, McIndoe, Miller, Morris, Newell, Nicholson, Radford, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Rogers, Ross, Rousseau, Starr, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Hamilton Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Wright—47.

So the motion to reconsider was not laid on the table.

The question recurred upon the motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of Mr. WILLIAMS was rejected.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Upon that question I call for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The House is now acting under the operation of the previous question, which does not exhaust itself until the third reading of the bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HOWE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of James Monroe Manning, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia; which was agreed to.

AMBOY AND TRAVERSE BAY RAILROAD.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 547) to amend an act entitled "An act to extend the time for the reversion to the United States of the lands granted by Congress to aid in the construction of a railroad from Amboy, by Hillsdale and Lansing, to some point on or near Traverse Bay, in the State of Michigan, and for the completion of said road," approved July 3, 1866, have directed me to report it back to the Senate with a recommendation that it pass; and as, while it is a trifling matter, it is of very great importance to the enterprise in Michigan that it should be adopted at this session, I ask that it be put upon its passage.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to amend the first section of the act of July 3, 1866, by striking out the word "February," where it occurs in that section, and inserting the word "July."

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will explain in one word what this bill is. At the last session Congress extended the time for the completion of this road seven years, according to the uniform practice in such cases; but there was a condition that the road between two points for a distance of about twenty miles should be graded by the 1st day of February; that is to-day. If it was not graded to that extent the branch was to be forfeited to the United States. I thought at the time that that condition could not be complied with and opposed it; and it is now found impossible for the company having charge of this work to comply with that condition of the law of the last session. This bill proposes to extend the time for the completion of the grading between those points up to the 1st day of July next.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PATTERSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 558) for the relief of Mary A. Smith, of Johnson county, Tennessee, widow of Alexander D. Smith, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. POLAND asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 559) in relation to guardians of minors in the District of Columbia, their appointment, powers, and duties; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 560) to create the office of surrogate of the District of Columbia, provide for the appointment of a surrogate, and define his powers and duties; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 561) to provide for the appointment of a marshal for the District of Columbia, and to change the mode of appointing that officer; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. W. G. MOORE, his Secretary, announced that on the 29th of January he had approved and signed a joint resolution (S. R. #### MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House No. 388, to authorize the extension, construction, and use of a lateral branch of the Baltimore and Potomac railroad into and within the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 204) to provide for an annual inspection into Indian affairs, and for other purposes, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolutions, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 904) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th June, 1868, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 1090) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to receive into the Treasury the residuary legacy of James Smithson, to authorize the Regents of the Smithsonian Institution to apply the income of the said legacy, and for other purposes;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 252) to permit Captain John A. Webster, jr., of the steamer Mahoning, to receive from the Government of Great Britain a gold chronometer; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 253) for the relief of Captain Daniel C. Trewitt, of the United States Army, of Hamilton county, Tennessee.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 218) exempting the property of debtors in the District of Columbia from levy, attachment, or sale on execution;

A bill (S. No. 479) to punish illegal voting in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 388) to authorize the extension, construction, and use of a lateral branch of the Baltimore and Potomac railroad into and within the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. No. 605) to amend an act to establish the judicial courts of the United States, approved September 24, 1789;

A bill (H. R. No. 719) to punish certain crimes in relation to the public securities and currency, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 660) for the relief of Captain James Starkey.

RESIDUARY LEGACY OF JAMES SMITHSON.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is a little bill on the table which has come in from the House that I should like very much to take up and have passed if no Senator has any objection to it, because it is rather necessary that it should be passed at once, if at all. It relates to the funds of the Smithsonian Institution, and the Regents of that institution are now in session in this city and would like probably to take some action under the bill. It is very short, and if there be no objection I should like to have it taken up and acted upon. I have examined it, and do not see any objection to it.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 1090) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to receive into the Treasury the residuary legacy of James Smithson, to authorize the Regents of the Smithsonian Institution to apply the income of the said legacy, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to receive into the Treasury, on the same terms as the original bequest, the residuary legacy of James Smithson, now in United States bonds in the hands of the Secretary, namely, $26,210 63, together with such other sums as the regents may, from time to time, see fit to deposit, not exceeding, with the original bequest, the sum of $1,000,000. The interest which has accrued, or which may hereafter accrue, from the residuary legacy is to be applied by the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution in the same manner as the interest on the original bequest, in accordance with the provisions of the act of August 10, 1846, establishing the Institution.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to inquire where that fund has been heretofore. Has it been in the Treasury?

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir; it has been in the hands of the Secretary. Under the bequest of Smithson there was a sum that was to come to the Institution upon the death of a certain person, and that person died just about the time I happened to be in the Treasury, and therefore I know the facts. This bill simply provides that this money shall be paid into the Treasury and disposed of precisely in accordance with the original act with regard to the disposal of Smithson's bequest.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to it at all.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 904) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th June, 1868, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 252) to permit Captain John A. Webster, jr., of the steamer Mahoning, to receive from the Government of Great Britain a gold chronometer, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 253) for the relief of Captain Daniel C. Trewhitt, of the United States Army, of Hamilton county, Tennessee, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

ORGANIZATION OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move to take up House bill No. 874. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill last evening, and as there was not a quorum present at the moment it was laid over. I ask that it be now taken up with a view of disposing of it.

The PRESIDENT, pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois moves to take up the bill (H. R. No. 874) to regulate the duties of the Clerk of the House of Representatives in preparing for the organization of the House, and for other purposes.

Mr. DAVIS. I am opposed to the passage of that bill. I do not think it is competent for Congress to pass it at all. The first section reads—

The PRESIDENT, pro tempore. The Chair will suggest that the bill is not yet before the Senate. The question is, Will the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill?

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT, pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass? and upon that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. DAVIS. I was going to state an objection or two that I have to the passage of this bill. The first section reads:

That before the first meeting of the next Congress, and of every subsequent Congress, the Clerk of the next preceding House of Representatives shall make a roll of the Representatives-elect, and place thereon the names of all persons claiming seats as Representatives-elect from States which were represented in the next preceding Congress, and of such persons only, and whose credentials show that they were regularly elected in accordance with the laws of their States respectively, or the laws of the United States.

My first objection to this bill is, that it proceeds by an act of Congress to designate an officer of the House of Representatives. My second objection is, that it authorizes that officer to pass upon the returns of members of the House, a duty and a power which by the Constitution, is devolved upon the House alone, and which cannot be assumed by an act of Congress delegating the exercise of that power to any specified officer. The Constitution, in providing for the House of Representatives, declares:

"The House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker and other officers."

The House of Representatives and the Senate each have the exclusive constitutional power to choose their own officers. What does this bill provide for? What does it intend to do? Simply to designate and name a most important officer of the House of Representatives. What is that officer to do? He is to be the organ of the House in its organization. He is to exercise the important office of organizing the House of Representatives. Is an officer who is to perform that duty an officer of the House? Is any man, by whatever name or title of office he may be designated, who is to perform that duty an officer of the House of Representatives? Certainly he is, and one of the most important of the officers of the House. The Clerk by this bill is to make out the roll of the members-elect. He is to perform that duty himself. He includes upon this roll the members of the House, every person that he chooses, and he may exclude.

We had an instance of the manner in which that power will be executed under this law at the organization of the present House of Representatives. The Clerk there proceeded to make out a list of members, excluding the members from eleven States. Was not that the performance of an office in the organization of the House, and an office of the highest moment and importance? Was not the Clerk who performed that duty an officer de facto at least of the House at that time? And is it not sought by this bill to make the same officer, if he be present, an officer de jure, and by operation of this act of the House on the organization of each subsequent House of Congress? Is it competent for Congress to pass a bill for that purpose? Is not such a bill in direct conflict with the provision which I read, that "the House shall choose their Speaker and other officers?" Is it not the exclusive constitutional right of each House for itself to appoint its organ and to prescribe the mode in which the roll of the House shall be made out and the other regulations by which the organization of the House is to take place? That is the constitutional function of each House. Each House has the power to act for itself in this matter, and the other House has no right and no power whatever to take part in it, even in the form of passing a law of Congress to regulate the matter.

Suppose this bill was to become a law; when the next House of Representatives get together might it not and ought it not to disregard the law? It would read this law and find it making a provision for the organization of the House and the manner and mode in which the roll of its members should be made out. The members of the House would turn to the Constitution and read that this was an office which each House was to perform for itself. The next House, or any other House of Representatives, might disregard this law, and in utter negation of it might proceed to organize the particular House according to its own discretion and order.

Another provision of the Constitution says:

"Each House shall be the judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its own members."

The bill under consideration interferes with that clause of the Constitution also, because it withdraws, in the organization of the House, the question of the returns of its members from the House itself, the constitutional body to take cognizance of that question, and vests it in the Clerk of the previous Congress. What power or competency has Congress to pass a law authorizing the Clerk of a defunct House of Representatives to pass upon the returns of the members of a succeeding House upon its organization? That is what is proposed to be done by this bill; and it is exactly what Congress cannot pass a law to effect. This matter is not a subject of legislation; it is not a subject of congressional action. The election of the officers of both branches of Congress, and the judgment upon the question of the returns, elections, and qualifications of their members, belong by the Constitution exclusively to the two Houses respectively. It cannot be made the subject of congressional legislation; no laws of Congress regulating these matters can be properly passed, and if they were passed they would be in derogation of those provisions of the Constitution, and they would have no obligation whatever upon either House. The two Houses might disregard them and proceed to the organization of their respective bodies as though this law never had passed, even if it does receive the forms of legislation.

Sir, I am not opposed to this bill simply because it is introduced by the Republican majority of the Senate; I am not opposed to it because it would operate to the prejudice of the Democratic party or any other party. I am opposed to it because it is in conflict with the Constitution and the rights and powers of the two Houses of Congress in the organization of their respective bodies. It attempts to grasp and to bring within the vortex of congressional legislation matters that belong exclusively by the Constitution to the two Houses themselves. Sir, a law of this kind ought not to be passed for the benefit of party interests. The tables may be turned, and will be turned, if not in favor of the Democratic party, to the prejudice of the Republican party, and in favor of some other party. The Republican party is not the party of permanence. Sooner or later it must go into the minority, and must become itself subject to the rule of another dominant political party.

In this view of the subject, without regard to the rights of the two Houses of Congress generally and to the proper restraint of all parties, those that are now in the ascendancy and those that may hereafter be in the ascendancy, I want this bill voted down, and I want the Senate to adhere faithfully and rigorously to the constitutional rule, that the two Houses of Congress alone shall elect their own officers; that no officers shall be provided by an act of Congress for either House, because each House has the exclusive right to elect its own officers, and especially that an officer of a past House of Representatives designated by an act of Congress shall not be clothed with the all-important power of passing upon the rights of members of the House of Representatives. It is a vast power, and it is just such a power as is proposed to be vested by this bill in the defunct Clerk of a preceding Congress. It cannot be said that he is not to judge of the returns of the members; he is made so in explicit language. The provision is that—

The Clerk of the next preceding House of Representatives shall make a roll of the Representatives-elect and place thereon the names of all persons claiming seats as Representatives-elect from States which were represented in the next preceding Congress, and of such persons only, and whose credentials show that they were regularly elected in accordance with the laws of their States respectively or the laws of the United States.

No man's name is to go upon this roll of the members of the House unless his credentials shall show that he was regularly elected in accordance with the laws of his State or the laws of the United States. Is not the decision of that question a judicial or a quasi-judicial decision? Does it not involve the very material and the existence of the House of Representatives?

Does it not clothe a defunct officer of a former House with the power of passing upon the returns of the members of the new House? It certainly does. We have seen this power once in the course of execution, and we have seen how magisterially a defunct Clerk of the preceding House did exercise it; and all this in defiance of the power of each House to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, to organize the body itself and to elect its own officers. Again:

"Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and with the concurrence of two thirds expel a member."

Here is an important rule of proceeding, one of the most important rules of proceeding in the organization of the House, which is sought by this bill to be wrested from the House and to be reposed, not in the House, but in a dead officer of a former House. I ask the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary if the Democratic party or any party hostile to the Republican party was now in power, and had possession of such a bill as this is, and were urging it upon the acceptance of the Senate with a view to partisan and party advantage, would he or any member of his party give their support to such a measure? I suppose he would not. I do not think that I would. I do not believe that to subserve the interests of any party in existence or that ever had existence or that ever may be in existence while I was a member of the Senate could I be brought to vote for such a bill as this. No, sir; the vice of the times, the rage of the demon of faction, is now to disregard Constitution and law and to warp both to party purposes. It is a system of legislation that is not only vicious but it is revolutionary; it is subversive of the Constitution, of the frame of our Government, and it is time that the party in power should turn their backs upon such a course of legislation as that.

A bill of this importance ought not to be voted for, according to my judgment, by any gentleman when in a majority where he would not be willing to give the same vote if in a minority. No gentleman is so credulous as to believe that the majority in the Senate would vote for this measure if the condition and the power of their party and of the Democratic party was reversed. But whatever party may offer such a measure, whatever it may be denominated, Democratic, Republican, Whig, it is a principle entirely new in the practice of the Government, in plain and direct conflict with the Constitution, and impinging the powers and the rights of both Houses in the selection of their officers, in judging upon the returns, elections, and qualifications of their members, and in declaring the rules and regulations by which they will proceed in their action. And what more important point of action is there than the organization of the House? I invoke gentlemen to awake from the delusion and from the frenzy of passion and of partisanship, and to allow to each House in the organization of that House at the beginning of each Congress, in the election of its officers, in judging of the returns of its members, all the powers which the Constitution so explicitly and exclusively guaranties to them. I trust, sir, this measure will not pass.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am really sorry that this little bill from the House of Representatives, by no means novel legislation, should have excited the denunciations of the Senator from Kentucky; but he should have gone into a passion over it and supposed that it was some party measure, and that it would not be voted for at all if the Republican party was not in a majority. He seems to suppose that it is a measure brought into the Senate by the Republican majority of the Senate. Why, sir, it is a bill from the House of Representatives, voted for by all parties, having nothing of a party character in it, and would as readily receive the assent of Congress at one time as another—a bill that met the unanimous assent of the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate after the amendment was adopted which struck out the penalty. And what is this bill that has excited such a storm of indignation? Why, sir, it is a bill prescribing the duty of the Clerk of the House of Representatives. Because the Clerk of the House of Representatives is elected by the House does anybody suppose that it is not competent for Congress by law to prescribe the duties of the Clerk? Does the Senator from Kentucky deny the authority of Congress by law to prescribe the duties of the Secretary of this body, of the Sergeant-at-Arms, of any officer of this body? Is this novel legislation? If the Senator from Kentucky had looked into the statute-book he would have found that the first section of the bill under consideration is but a transcript of the law as it already exists, which declares—

"That before the first meeting of the next Congress and of every subsequent Congress the Clerk of the next preceding House of Representatives shall make a roll of the Representatives-elect and place thereon the names of all persons, and of such persons only, whose credentials show that they were regularly elected in accordance with the laws of their States respectively or the laws of the United States."

That is the law of the land to-day, passed years ago.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the Senator give me the date of that law?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir; I will give the Senator the date of the law. It is the 3d of March, 1863. It was passed nearly four years ago, and the origin of this law was the inconvenience that was found in the House of Representatives in its organization by having no means prescribed for calling it together. This is a preliminary proceeding. The House has to get together in some way. Some persons must be treated as members in the first preliminary proceeding. A mob from the street cannot come in and control. Hence it has been the custom, either under direct provision of law or without that provision, for the Clerk of the former House to call the names of the members. Some difficulties had arisen, as we all know, in this preliminary organization, and all parties thought it better to provide that a list should be made up in some form. It settles nothing except to enable the House to get together and proceed to take the preliminary steps for its organization.

The Senator from Kentucky is astounded at that and thinks there is some "cat under the meal" that is going to destroy the Constitution of his country; he has taken alarm and is opposed to this because the Republican majority of the Senate has brought it in. Sir, it is not brought in by the Senate at all, neither by a Republican majority nor by any other majority, or a minority; it is a bill which came here from the other House.

And now how does this bill differ from the present law? The first section is precisely the same, as the Senate will see, word for word; in prescribing the duties of the Clerk, except that it contains a clause providing that the Clerk shall only put upon his list members from States which were represented in the preceding Congress.

Has the Senator from Kentucky any objection to that? Does he want the great question as to what States are entitled to be represented to be settled by the Clerk? Is he not willing that Congress should determine that question? His opinions may be one way and mine another; but would he devolve that upon the Clerk? Would he not leave that to be settled by the Houses themselves? Does he want to produce anarchy and confusion in the organization of the House? What is he after? This is a transcript of the present law with that single exception.

The second section of the bill provides that in case the Clerk is unable to perform his duty, by reason of sickness, death, absence, or for any other cause, some other person shall have authority to call the roll. Will not the Senator from Kentucky have it done by anybody? Is he not willing that the law should prescribe somebody to call the roll, or does he want confusion and anarchy and misrule? The House of Representatives have said, if the Clerk is unable to attend to it, the Sergeant-at-Arms shall attend to it; and in case of his inability, the Doorkeeper; and has the Senator from Kentucky any objections to that? Perhaps some other officer might have been provided; but the House thought proper, in their judgment, to devolve it upon these two. Somebody has to do it to prevent confusion. Is it not better to determine in advance who shall do it? This is all that there is in the bill, and I hope that the Senate will pass it.

Mr. McDUGALL. I desire to ask the Senator from Illinois if any occasion has arisen in the history of this Republic that demands such legislation?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Certainly it has, and the legislation took place four years ago.

Mr. McDUGALL. I do not know the occasion, and I should like to be informed what occasion necessitated such legislation.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There has been confusion frequently in the organization of the House. It is not my business to post the Senator from California, who is much better informed than I am in the history of the country. I have no doubt that a gentleman of so many years and of such venerable appearance will recollect the difficulty that arose years ago in the House of Representatives when Mr. Adams, of Massachusetts, by a sort of common consent, was called to the chair when there was a dispute as to who had a right to preside at all. I know that from his age and knowledge of public affairs at that time and many years before, the Senator from California remembers those things better than I do.

Mr. McDUGALL. I am informed.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois does not answer any of the objections which I have made to this bill, as I understand his answer. On the contrary, he concedes the main objection which I have made, and that is that the bill devolves the organization of the House from the House itself, where the Constitution places it, to an officer who is now proposed to be appointed by this act for the House.

The honorable Senator says truly that in 1863 a similar measure was passed. We all know that; but the principle was just as objectionable then as it is now, and the manner in which that law has operated, by clothing the clerk of a former House with the power to exclude Representatives from eleven States, is the strongest objection that could be made to the law.

The honorable Senator asks me if I want disorder and confusion to reign in the organization of the House. Certainly not. From 1789 up to 1863 was there any such disorder and confusion? How were the Houses then organized? It is true that the Clerk of the former House informally, and without any authority, by sufferance, was permitted to make out a roll of the members-elect; he was indulged by the sufferance of each House, by its will, by its permission, to read over that roll and call out the names of the members of the House. When I was first a member of the House of Representatives, in 1839, that process was being in operation. Mr. Garland, who had been Clerk of the previous House, refused to call the names of the members elected from the State of New Jersey.

We saw, then, how this power, exerted by the Clerk under sufferance and usage, which is now proposed to be sanctioned by positive enactment, operated. Its operation was that it prevented the House from being organized for six weeks; and at length, to solve the difficulty, the House dethroned that Clerk, removed him from the position at the table which he was occupying, and from reading the roll of members of the House, and took upon itself the exercise of that office according to its own direction and order, and instead of the former Clerk being allowed to preside over the House in its organization he was precluded from that position and John Quincy Adams was placed in the chair. There was no confusion, no disorder, no disorganization then introduced except by the act of the Clerk himself, and he was acting in strict conformity to the line of conduct which he is empowered to adopt by this bill.

When the Convention that framed the Constitution met, when the First Congress elected under it assembled, when any deliberative assembly or convention is organized, what is the process? The mass of the members are regularly elected, they have the returns of their own election, and their election is not controverted. If there be any members claiming seats in the particular body whose right to seats is contested, those whose rights are not contested undertake the inquiry and determine who are authorized to sit in the body as members. That is the principle and the rule adopted by the Constitution in relation both to the Senate and the House of Representatives. When the first House of Representatives got together under the Constitution, if any of its members, or men claiming to be members of it, had had their seats controverted, those whose seats were not contested would have got together and would have decided the question whether those whose seats were contested were entitled to membership or not.

The honorable Senator from Illinois has not pretended to answer any objection that I have made; at least he has not answered any that I have taken to this bill, as I understand. "The House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker and other officers," says the Constitution. Is not the Clerk of a former House of Representatives, on the organization of a succeeding one, who is empowered by this act to perform the office which he is required to perform under it, an officer of the House that is to be then organized? I ask the honorable Senator from Illinois to answer me that question. On the 4th of March, the House of Representatives of a new Congress is to be organized. How is it to be organized? The Clerk of the present House is required to make out a list of the members who are elected according to the laws of Congress and of their respective States, by his own judgment and discretion. He may exclude whom he pleases, he may admit whom he pleases.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Not at all. The law says he shall put on the name of every man that is regularly returned. That is the present law.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand the law. This bill is that he shall put on the roll the names of members "whose credentials show that they were regularly elected in accordance with the laws of their States respectively, or the laws of the United States." Suppose it becomes a question upon the credentials of any one of the Representatives, whether he has been elected in accordance with the laws of his State or the laws of the United States? Is not the decision of that question a quasi judicial one? Is it not a legal question? Who is to decide that question? Who but this Clerk? And in deciding the question, does not the Clerk act as an officer, and the most potential officer of the new House of Representatives?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. TRUMBULL. How would he have it decided? There is no House; there is nobody to vote upon it. Is a crowd to come in from the street? The Senator says he was present in 1839; let me ask him does he want that scene reenacted?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir, and for that reason I do not want a law passed authorizing a Clerk to do what a Clerk then did by usage and sufferance.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Who can do it?

Mr. DAVIS. The honorable Senator asks me how the different Houses shall be organized. I answer, just as they were organized from 1789 up to three years ago. He asks me if I would be willing to allow a crowd to come in from the street and to usurp or interfere with the organization of the House. Certainly not, and there is no danger of such a disorder as that. Nothing of the kind ever has occurred; and it never will occur. It is the simplest matter in the world to organize a new House of Representatives. They are to be organized as they had been from the beginning of the Government up to 1863. The persons elected convene in the capital; and at the opening of the session they go into the Representatives' Hall. They bring their returns in their pockets, made out according to the forms and requisitions of law. It is known before hand, and well and distinctly known, who have been elected and who have not been elected, whose seats are contested and whose seats are not to be contested. The great mass of the members being elected according to law, and there being no objection whatever to their right to take their seats, they get together and they organize by appointing a temporary chairman. The Clerk heretofore has acted somewhat in that capacity, but they may appoint anybody they please.

But here is the question which I propound to the Senator from Illinois: is the Clerk of the former House of Representatives, who is required by this bill to act a part in the organization of the new House of Representatives, an officer of that new House? He is an officer, and he is a most potential officer of the body; more so than the Clerk or the Sergeant-at-Arms, or any other officer of that body that they may subsequently elect. He exercises the function of deciding what is and what is not the proper constituent materiel of the House; he admits whom he pleases, and excludes whom he pleases. He is made by the law specially and particularly the judge of the returns of the members of the House; and he is made that judge according to the laws of Congress and of the States. This is plainly a judicial function; a quasi judicial power, a power of the utmost importance in the organization of the House. Congress is now proceeding by law to name for the next House of Representatives this important officer, who is to perform this great function.

Mr. McDUGALL. I ask the Senator whether that is not a mere matter of administration and not judicial at all?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir. I ask the honorable Senator from California if to judge of the returns of a Representative according to the laws of the State and of the United States is not a quasi judicial act?

Mr. McDUGALL. There are a few acts that are called quasi judicial, and those acts are never judicial finally, but only admitted to be quasi judicial because there is no other term that exactly defines them. No judgment vests in the Clerk; he is merely to take the returns and make a record, and when the record is made it is presented to the body.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, suppose the act be not judicial or quasi judicial, suppose it be simply ministerial, is it not the act of a ministerial officer of the House? That does not obviate the objection; it only changes the form of it. Congress has no more power to pass a law establishing a ministerial officer for the House of Representatives than it has to pass a law establishing a judicial officer or a quasi judicial officer for that House.

The exception I take is that you undertake by act of Congress to appoint an officer for the House in the important matter of the organization of that House when the Constitution declares that all officers of the House, whether for that or any other function or purpose, shall be chosen by the House itself.

Another objection which I take is—

Mr. POLAND. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky give way to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. POLAND. I do not desire to say anything in reference to this matter, but I wish to interpose at this time a call for the regular order of the day. If it is deemed advisable to go on and complete the bill now under consideration I shall not object to that, for my experience has been that it is generally better to finish a job while you are about it; but the bankrupt bill is the special order of the day. I am willing that it should be laid aside informally to allow the bill under discussion to be completed. I shall not object to that.

Mr. TRUMBULL. All I wish is to go on with the bill under consideration. I think there will be no objection to that course.

Mr. DAVIS. I did not have the pleasure of hearing a single word that was uttered by the honorable Senator from Vermont. I will proceed with my remarks.

I read another provision of the Constitution, that each House may determine the rules of its proceedings. One House cannot determine the rules of proceeding for a subsequent House; no more can Congress do it by the passage of a law. This is a right, individual, exclusive, belonging to each successive House, to be exercised for itself and by itself, without any control either of former Houses or of laws passed by Congress.

Here, sir, is an act reported to regulate in part the manner of the organization of the House, to regulate in part the proceedings of the House of Representatives upon its organization. I think it is not competent for Congress to pass such a law, because the whole matter of determining the rules of proceeding by each House on its organization for the direction and management of its business devolves upon that House, and Congress has no right to pass laws encroaching upon the power of the House over such a subject.

But, sir, the other is the great and momentous objection which I make to this bill, that it appoints the Clerk of the former House as the officer of each succeeding House upon its organization to pass upon the returns of the members of the House. This is a power, in my judgment, which Congress cannot legitimately and constitutionally exercise. I believe that if this bill be passed it will have no binding effect whatever upon any House; they would have the right utterly to disregard it and to go on and elect their own officers, either to make out a roll of members or to do any other function in the organization and the proceedings of the House, and themselves to determine what persons claiming seats were properly elected or had the proper returns and what had not, and also to determine for themselves whether the returns of all the members or any of the members were according to the laws of Congress and of the States whence the members came.

All this would devolve upon each House when it met, and the Senator from Illinois by his measure—although it originates in the House, and although it has the evil sanction of a precedent passed in the year 1863—cannot, in my opinion, properly withdraw the performance and exercise of this power of both Houses from the two Houses individually and assume it by the passage of a law by Congress.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll on the passage of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON, (when his name was called.) I concurred in the report of the chairman of the committee in favor of this bill; first, because I had no doubt of the right of Congress to pass it; and second, because I thought it was a subject that should be provided for by legislation. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 6; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Cragin, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fogg, Foster, Fowler, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Howe, Johnson, Kirkwood, Lane, Morgan, Morrill, Norton, Poland, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Hendricks, Nesmith, Patterson, and Saulsbury—6.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Cowan, Cresswell, Dixon, Doollittle, Frelinghuysen, Guthrie, Howard, McDougall, Nye, Pomerooy, Riddle, Wade, and Wiley—15.

So the bill was passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up Senate bill No. 543, to abolish and forever prohibit the system of peonage in the Territory of New Mexico and other parts of the United States. I think that it will take but a moment to pass the bill.

Mr. POLAND. If it be true that that bill is going to take but a moment or a few moments, as the Senator from Massachusetts supposes, I have no objection to its being taken up and the bankrupt bill being laid aside informally for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bankrupt bill is not now before the Senate.

Mr. POLAND. Some ten days ago the bankrupt bill was before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was before the Senate and was made a special order, and it is now on the Calendar as a special order. The time for which it was assigned has passed, so that it does not now come up, of course, and any other motion is in order. That bill will only come up when there is no other business before the Senate, and then it will have priority on the Calendar.

Mr. POLAND. My recollection in relation to the condition of it is different from that stated by the Chair. The bankrupt bill was taken up for consideration on a Saturday, and the consideration of the bill was continued until the adjournment on that Saturday. On the succeeding Monday morning it was laid aside informally for the purpose of taking up the tariff bill, and was not made a special order at all, according to my recollection.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I really hope the bankrupt bill will be taken up. I recollect the circumstances under which it was laid aside which, I feel bound to state, were as the Senator from Vermont has detailed them, though I do not know whether by the rules of the Senate it now retains its place or not; that is a question for the President to decide. I only say that I think, in fairness to the Senator from Vermont, it ought now to resume its place and be taken up. As we have finished the matter which displaced it and which has been before the Senate for so long a time, I hope the Senate will consent to take up the bankrupt bill and act upon it. I think that is due to the Senator from Vermont from the circumstances under which he was obliged to consent to its postponement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion before the Senate is the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WILSON. I concur with the Senator from Maine in regard to the bankrupt bill, and I do not wish to be in the way of it; but the bill which I have moved to take up is a very brief bill, that can be passed in a few minutes. If, however, it should lead to debate and the consumption of time I shall be willing to give way.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have a small bill, a House bill, that I do not think will occupy much time, which I desire to call up this morning. I gave notice some time ago that I would antagonize it against any other measure except an appropriation bill. The bill to which I allude is a bill to provide for the building of a ship-canal around the Falls of Niagara, a measure in which every man East and West has an interest. I hope the Senate will consent to take it up and pass it. It was discussed at great length during last session, and I presume that every Senator who desires to speak upon it has given his views. If the Senate will consent to take it up and let me have a vote on it I will submit it without discussion. I think every member has made up his mind precisely how he will vote on that bill, and I therefore ask the Senate to take it up this morning and put it on its passage; and if it be in order to make such a motion now I move that it be taken up. ["No; no."]

Mr. WILSON. As the Senator from Vermont seems to be pressing his bill, and nobody else wants to give way, I am very willing to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts withdraw his motion?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. POLAND. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 598.

Mr. CHANDLER. I dislike exceedingly to antagonize the measure of which I have spoken with any other. I am in favor of the Senator's bankrupt bill, and shall vote for it, but really we all know that it will lead to a long discussion. I hope the ship-canal bill will not. Of course it is in the power of the Senate to settle the order of its business; but I give notice that if the bankrupt bill is not taken up I shall ask the Senate to take up House bill No. 344. Indeed, if it is in order, I will now submit the motion that the Senate lay aside the present and all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 344.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is another motion pending, the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope the Senate will vote to take up the bankrupt bill. I have been watching for several days for an opportunity to get a quarter of an hour, but have not been able to obtain it. I rise now only to object to this system of trying to establish a lien, by common consent of the House, for other business after this bill shall have been disposed of. I have been inclined to take up the bill referred to by the Senator from Michigan, but if he undertakes in this manner to saddle it upon the Senate I shall vote against his motion when the time comes.

Mr. LANE. I think I am rather disinterested about this controversy; I am opposed to both bills, but I believe there is less danger in the ship-canal than the bankrupt bill, and I shall vote to take up the former in preference to the latter, though I am opposed to both.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

The motion was agreed to.

THE BANKRUPT BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, accordingly resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 698) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to strike out the following words in section fourteen, from line twenty-seven to line thirty-three:

And such other property not included in the foregoing exceptions as is exempted from levy and sale upon execution by the laws of the State in which the bankrupt has his domicile at the time of the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, to an amount not exceeding that allowed by such State exemption laws in force in the year 1864.

So as to make the proviso read:

Provided, however, That there shall be excepted from the operation of the provisions of this section the necessary household and kitchen furniture, and such other articles and necessities of such bankrupt as the said assignee shall designate and set apart, having reference to the amount to the family, condition, and circumstances of the bankrupt, but altogether not to exceed in value, in any case, the sum of $500; and also the wearing apparel of such bankrupt, and that of his wife and children, and the uniform, arms, and equipments of any person who is or has been a soldier in the militia or in the service of the United States; and such other property as now is, or hereafter shall be, exempted from attachment or seizure or levy on execution by the laws of the United States.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I hope those words will not be stricken out. It is well known that these exemption laws exist in the several States and contracts have always been made in reference to them; in fact the laws of the States affording these exemptions are part and parcel of the very contract when the credit is extended. The understanding is when the credit is given that the creditor has a right to reach into the property that is exempt. It is part and parcel of the contract when it is made, and therefore I hope that this clause will not be stricken out.

On this subject of the bankrupt law, without going into a formal speech on the question, I have to say that I am very decidedly in favor of the passage of a general bankrupt law. The circumstances in which the country is now placed, owing to the terrible convulsion through which we have passed, are such, and the change of the currency from year to year has been so great, so violent, that the word "dollar," in which all contracts are made and in which they must be enforced, has been continually changing in its meaning; it has been an unknown quantity which in mathematics would be represented by  $x$  or  $y$ . It has not been anything certain, and therefore it is utterly unjust to endeavor to enforce literally contracts which have been made in these times of convulsion. This is true of all the northern States. It is true also of the States of the South. Hundreds and thousands of contracts even have been made at the South by which men were required to pay a given number of dollars; these contracts were made perhaps when Confederate currency was the only money of the South. This bankrupt law coming after all these convulsions will, in my judgment, do very much toward bringing peace to the country.

We know that in that system of government which was established, we may say, under Divine inspiration, it was a settled maxim that every seven years was to be a year of jubilee, when debts were to be settled and canceled, men were to be released from their bondage, and every seventh jubilee the whole real estate of the Jewish State came under the operation of this general jubilee, by which the descendants were once more permitted to reënter into the possessions and enjoy the lands of their ancestors.

Mr. President, I have no desire to occupy the time of the Senate. What I desire is that we come to a vote. I think it would be unwise for us to undertake, under our general bankrupt law, to wipe out of existence all the exemption laws which have been established by the various States, laws which were in existence, well known to parties, in view of which the contracts were made which are to be settled and disposed of by the operation of the law itself.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, it might be very unwise, as the Senator from Wisconsin says, for us to undertake to wipe out the various exemption laws of the different States; but the Senator from Wisconsin must be aware that the Constitution of the United States declares in so many words that Congress shall have power to "establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy throughout the United States." Now, I wish to submit to the Senator from Wisconsin, if this bill read in this wise: "There shall be exempted from the operations of this act in the State of Illinois a homestead worth $1,000 to each bankrupt; in the State of Wisconsin a homestead worth $200; in the State of Connecticut fifty dollars' worth of personal property," and so on, incorporating expressly the terms of the exemption laws of the various States, scarcely any two of which are alike, does he believe that we have authority to pass such a law as that under the Constitution which gives us power to pass a bankrupt law which shall be uniform throughout the United States? Would that be a uniform law which declared that $1,000 worth of property should be exempted from the operations of the law in Illinois and only $100 worth in Wisconsin? Have we any authority to pass such a law? By the committee on the Judiciary, who considered this question, it was thought otherwise. They considered that there was no such authority. That was the trouble. This is the report of the committee, and the question is on agreeing to the amendment moved by the Committee on the Judiciary. That committee were of opinion—and I wish to submit the point to the lawyers of this body—that Congress clearly had no authority to pass such a law exempting one species of property from the operations of the bankrupt act in one State and another and different species of property and a different amount in another and a different State; and hence the committee reported this amendment to strike out this clause, and the question now before the Senate is on agreeing to this amendment recommended by the Committee on the Judiciary. It may be desirable not to interfere with the existing exemption laws of the various States, and on that question I shall not enter into a discussion with the Senator from Wisconsin. He tells us that contracts have been made in reference to those laws; but is that an answer to this insurmountable difficulty, in the opinion of the Judiciary Committee, to the enactment of the law in this form?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If my friend will allow me on that point to state to him briefly my answer to him, I will do so.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Very well.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. My opinion is that wherever the law of a State has allowed a person to set apart a given amount of property, personal or real, which is set apart for the benefit of the family as a homestead, there are other parties besides the man himself who have an interest in that property. It belongs to the family, to the wife, to the children of the family, and the law gives it as a special property set apart for the benefit, not of this particular man, but for the independence and the support of the family, to prevent the family from becoming so impoverished as to come upon the town. For this reason the laws of the several States controlling that subject authorize this property to be set apart in trust for the family, and they further authorize it to be held by the family independent of the debts which may be incurred by the head of the family. That property being thus set apart becomes a sacred trust fund not liable to be reached by the creditors, and each State judges for itself to what extent this trust fund shall be set apart, and that independent of the judgment of creditors. And when the law of Congress simply says that the property which is thus set apart in the several States for the benefit of the family as a homestead shall not be reached by the operation of this bankrupt law, I maintain that this bankrupt law is uniform.

The same rule prevails in one State as in another. It is the same rule in Illinois that it is in Wisconsin. The rule is that under this bankrupt law the creditor shall only reach such property as is liable to be reached by a creditor; in short, that the creditor shall not reach the trust fund which the State has allowed to be set aside, not for the man, because the moment he ceases to be the head of a family or to live in his homestead he ceases to have any right in this property, and then it becomes liable to be reached by creditors; but so long as the family exists it is set apart as a trust fund for that family. The law of the State regards the debt which a man owes to his wife and his children, the obligation into which he enters when he contracts the marriage relation and establishes a family, as the most sacred of all debts, the debt of all others which the State is willing to defend in order to secure the independence and the existence of the family itself. This homestead, therefore, is a sacred trust fund, wholly independent of creditors; and, if we pass a law which allows creditors to reach all the rest of a debtor's property and not reach this trust fund set apart for his family, I do not think it is a violation of the Constitution in not being uniform. It is true the laws of the States may vary, and the amount of the trust fund is not precisely in one State as it is in another, but the rule by which you reach the debtor's property is precisely the same rule in every State, and the rule by which you are limited in reaching it is the same in every State.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is not an uncommon thing for attorneys in arguing cases to get up some other point than the one before the court. The Senator from Wisconsin has been arguing about a trust fund belonging to the family. That is not the question. This bill in its legal effect is precisely the same as though it had incorporated into it the exemption law of every State in this Union. Does the Senator deny that? The language is, after proceeding to exempt certain property:

And such other property not included in the foregoing exceptions as is exempted from levy and sale upon execution by the laws of the State in which the bankrupt has his domicile at the time of the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy.

This law is to operate, not simply for the present, but for the future. Now let me put a case to the Senator from Wisconsin. Suppose the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, now in session, should pass a law that all the property of a debtor, the whole of it, should be exempt from execution whether he had a family or not; suppose the State of Wisconsin should pass such a law in March next, and we pass this bankrupt bill to-day, and you should endeavor to enforce it in Wisconsin, what would be the result? This act declares that whatever property is exempt from levy and sale upon execution by the laws of the State of Wisconsin, in which the bankrupt has his domicile at the time of the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, shall be exempted under this law. This bill makes that State law a part of it. It is not merely the laws of the various States now exempting property from execution and sale, but whatever law exists in any State hereafter at the time the proceeding in bankruptcy is instituted is made a part of this bankrupt act.

Mr. POLAND. I beg to correct the Senator from Illinois. I understand him to say that this is made subject to such exemption laws as may be passed hereafter by the States.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir; I do say so.

Mr. POLAND. If the Senator will only take the trouble to read this portion of the section he will see his mistake without being corrected. The language is:

And such other property not included in the foregoing exceptions as is exempted from levy and sale upon execution by the laws of the State in which the bankrupt has his domicile at the time of the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, to an amount not exceeding that allowed by such State exemption laws in force in the year 1864.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Vermont is correct; it is limited by a subsequent clause of the section to such property as was exempted by the State laws in force in the year 1864. I did not read the whole sentence through. I find I was in error in supposing that it adopted as a part of this law the State laws that may be enacted hereafter; but I do not think that alters the principle. The section, it will be noticed, adopts as part of this bankrupt act the exemption laws of the States in force in the year 1864; or rather, as I see on looking at it, allows property not exceeding the amount exempted by the State laws in force at that time to be retained by the bankrupt. I am still right, then; it does adopt, not only the State laws in force in 1864, but those laws which shall hereafter be in force in any State when the proceeding in bankruptcy is commenced, provided the exemption allowed by those future laws shall not be greater than that allowed by the laws in force in 1864. Is that so? Let us read it and see if it is not. This is merely a limitation upon the amount of property that may be exempted; but the laws of the States may vary, as they do, from time to time. Take the case of a proceeding in bankruptcy commenced against a bankrupt in the State of Vermont in the year 1867. I do not know what the exemption law of Vermont is.

Mr. POLAND. A homestead valued at $500.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then if a proceeding is commenced in 1867, the present year, under this bill, if it passes, a homestead worth $500 would be exempted from its operation in the State of Vermont, because such was the law of that State in 1864; but if in 1868 the Legislature of Vermont should think proper to exempt only a homestead worth $300, then I say to the Senator from Vermont under this bill a bankrupt in that State who should be proceeded against in 1868 would have exempted only a homestead worth $300. This is merely a limitation upon the extent of the exemption; and this bill proposes to adopt whatever exemption laws may be passed hereafter in any of the States and which shall be in force when the proceeding in bankruptcy is commenced, provided the exemption laws hereafter passed in any State shall not exempt a larger amount of property than was exempted by the law in force in the State in the year 1864. There is no escape from that.

The principle is in the bill just as I stated it; but the Senator from Wisconsin, who after having made his argument has left the Chamber, places it upon the ground that we have a right to incorporate into this bill the various exemption laws of the different States, because those exemption laws are in favor of women and children. Now, I undertake to say to that Senator that the exemption laws are not in favor exclusively of women and children. There is no "trust fund" involved in this matter. There is an exemption in my State in favor of every debtor, whether he has a wife and children or not; and I presume that is the case in every other State of the Union; but those laws are as diverse and different as the States themselves.

Does the Senator from Wisconsin mean to say that the Congress of the United States, under an authority to pass a uniform law in regard to bankruptcy, has a right to pass a law that shall give to the Senator from Vermont $100 worth of property if he should become bankrupt—that is a very bad illustration I know—and allow me $500 in case I should become bankrupt, which is a good illustration and a very probable one, perhaps. [Laughter.] It might be convenient for me to retain $500 and for him to have but $100; but would that be a uniform system of bankruptcy? Is it possible for us without a manifest violation of the Constitution to pass a bill making such a provision, and a bill which I undertake to say adopts the future legislation of the various States in regard to exemptions, provided those future laws do not exceed the amount that was allowed to be exempted by the laws of such State in existence in 1864?

It was the opinion of the Judiciary Committee that this could not be done, and hence they reported this amendment striking out these words. It seems to me that the committee in their opinion of the power of Congress were correct, and that if we pass a law establishing a uniform system of bankruptcy we must pass one that exempts the same property or the same amount of property to an individual in one State as in another, and we must pass a law that is not liable to be varied by the legislation of the States hereafter. I do not believe it is competent for us to incorporate into this act the various exemption laws of the different States and then declare it to be a uniform system of bankruptcy.

Mr. WADE. Mr. President, my own inclinations have been to go in favor of a bankrupt law, my opinion being that it is impolitic for the country to keep business men who have been unfortunate involved so that they cannot at any time enter into business again. But, however this may be, my convictions are not strong upon that subject; and the Ohio Legislature at the last session, I believe unanimously, or very nearly so, instructed the Senators from the State to go against a bankrupt law.

Mr. SHERMAN. It was two years ago.

Mr. WADE. I thought it was at their last session. At any rate, their last action on the subject was to instruct us against such a bill, by a vote unanimous, or nearly so. Perhaps my colleague knows how that was.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not.

Mr. WADE. Although I have never held so rigidly as some to the right of a State Legislature to instruct the Senators from the State, yet I think great deference is due to the opinions of the Legislature whose representatives in a measure we are, or at any rate representatives of the people behind them, whose opinions they know as well as we do. I think we ought under such circumstances to defer to their judgment, and I shall therefore feel compelled to vote against the bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I believe the question is upon the amendment proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary to section fourteen, on page 17. I desired very much to take the view of that amendment expressed by the Senator from Wisconsin; but I was not and am not able now to do so. I think the view taken by the Senator from Illinois is the one which we are compelled to take, that to make the law uniform the amount of property which shall be left to the discharged bankrupt must be the same in all the States. If we should allow him to retain $1,000 in one State and $5,000 in another certainly that would not be a uniform system. And if we adopt as part of this act the laws of the various States it will be making the system as diverse as the laws of the States themselves.

But I wish to suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin that I think the evils which he apprehends do not arise. The object of this bill is to discharge a man altogether from his indebtedness that he may start out in life afresh. When he gets that discharge from all obligations under this bill he goes out of court with the property which this bill allows him to retain. The object and effect of the State laws exempting property from final process are not the same. A State law exempting property from execution is not a discharge from the indebtedness; it simply provides that when an execution may be issued against a party the officer in the execution of that writ shall leave to the party a specified amount of property. It is not an insolvent's discharge; it is the property which he holds, notwithstanding his liability to execution. The property which he holds under this bill he holds as a discharged debtor from his debts entirely. The laws of the States will remain, notwithstanding the passage of this bill, to have precisely the same effect that they do now. Until a man is discharged the laws of the State will protect him in the property exempted under them; but when he comes to be discharged the amount that he shall hold must be the same in all the States. The passage of this bill, in my view of the subject, will not impair the efficiency of the State laws exempting property from execution; and I do not anticipate the evils which the Senator from Wisconsin fears.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I suppose the Senator from Indiana does not doubt that under the laws of the States property may be settled upon the wife or the children of the debtor discharged of his debts, so as not to be subject to be taken for his debts.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Property owned by the wife and the children under circumstances that justify it, of course, is exempted from execution for the debts of the husband and father.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Or property which the husband may have given to the wife, and settled upon the wife before the debt was contracted.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, sir, if conveyed before the debt was contracted and the property was suitable to their condition, and the transaction was under circumstances that did not raise the question of fraud.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If a man has $50,000 worth of property and he is free from debt, can he not settle the whole $50,000 upon his wife under the laws of the States and have it retained by her, so as to be free and discharged from future debts or liabilities incurred by him?

Mr. HENDRICKS. That would depend much on the intent of the party. If he intended to contract debts in the future and be the apparent owner of property which he had transferred to his wife, such an arrangement in my judgment would not stand.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Of course a fraudulent intent may avoid all contracts and may set them all aside; but if in good faith a man settles property on his wife and children when he is not in debt they may hold that property free from his subsequent debts, and if he afterwards went into bankruptcy you could not reach that property thus settled upon the wife and children by virtue of the laws of the States. There are some States perhaps that go so far as to forbid the settling of property upon the wife and children in this way, but most of them certainly allow it.

Now, the States allow the husband to hold exempt from execution a homestead, not for himself, but for the family, as being essential to the existence and the independence of the family, in order to carry out the obligation which he contracts by virtue of his being the head of a family, an obligation higher than, superior to, and more sacred than, any other he can contract. The laws of the several States allow him to invest in a homestead, which is to be held as long as it is occupied as a homestead, independent and discharged of his debts. Some States allow to a given amount, some allow more, some allow less; but when this person goes into bankruptcy the rule of the court of bankruptcy should be to reach just that property which is liable under the laws of the State to be reached, and not reach that property which constitutes this trust fund, this fund which is not to be reached by creditors, this fund which is necessary to the family and its independence.

Mr. President, I regard the State laws defending the homestead of the family, allowing it to be retained, as important; and my judgment is that it would be impossible to pass a bankrupt law through this House and the House of Representatives which would require the debtor to surrender the homestead which under the laws of the States has been sacredly set apart for his family.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Allow me to interrupt the Senator for a moment. If the property in fact belongs to the wife and the children, of course neither by Federal nor State laws can it be reached for the debts of the husband and father. So that question does not arise. If the homestead be protected as against creditors in the State of Wisconsin this bill, if it passes and becomes a law, will not place the debtor in any worse condition than he was before.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Why not?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Because he does not have to strip himself of his homestead unless he applies to be a discharged bankrupt. If he remains under the law of the State, allows the creditors to seek their remedy against him under that law, he is protected by the law of the State that exempts a certain amount of property from execution.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. But the creditors can proceed under this law to put the debtor in bankruptcy.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If he has been guilty of fraud.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If it is necessary to carry out this doctrine that the law must be uniform, then the creditor proceeding under this bill in bankruptcy has a right to deprive the debtor of his homestead in any State if in any of the States the State law does not give the debtor a homestead; otherwise it is not uniform according to this argument.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator is discussing one part of this bill and I was referring to another. I was speaking of the voluntary portion of the bill.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The uniformity of a bankrupt law is all the point at issue, because I understood the honorable Senator from Illinois to admit that he would not be disposed to disturb the homestead exemption laws of the several States provided he could constitutionally support a bankrupt law without that clause which is now in this bill and which is moved to be stricken out.

Mr. TRUMBULL. What I said, I think, was that I had no disposition to interfere with the exemption laws of the States, but that I did not think Congress had any authority when passing a uniform system of bankruptcy to adopt them; and if the Senator from Wisconsin had remained in his seat and listened to me he would have seen that I answered his argument about the family. The family has nothing to do with it. This bill does not propose to take property that belongs to the family. It proposes to take the property that belongs to the bankrupt himself; and the bankrupt may have no family. Property is exempted in favor of the debtor in my State whether he has a family or not.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. A homestead?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, a homestead. Suppose a woman is a bankrupt. A woman may be a bankrupt.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. But she may be the head of a family.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, and she may be a bankrupt without having a family.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The homestead is exempted if occupied by a family.

Mr. TRUMBULL. A woman in my State is entitled to occupy a homestead from her debtors, whether she has children or not, and though her husband be dead.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President—

Mr. HOWARD. In the midst of this colloquy, I want to ask my friend from Illinois one question.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Wait until I get through.

The point of the Senator from Illinois is that under the Constitution this law must be uniform in its operation. Now, a creditor in the State of New York proceeds in bankruptcy against a debtor, takes his property, disposes of his property under this bill. What is the rule of disposition? In the State of New York by the State laws a homestead to the amount of $1,000 is exempted. In the State of Connecticut perhaps there is no homestead exempted, but only a certain amount of personal property. If you proceed in bankruptcy in Connecticut you do not leave any homestead to the debtor. Therefore, there is no uniformity in this proceeding, according to the argument of the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from Illinois. The Senator from Indiana claims that it need only be uniform as to the amount of property which is held by the debtor when the debtor himself proceeds in bankruptcy and asks for his discharge. I put the case of the creditor proceeding against the debtor, and that argument of the Senator from Indiana answers the other. The truth is, the law passed by Congress is uniform if it adopts a uniform rule, and that rule is to reach the property which under the law of the State is liable for the payment of debts, and not to undertake to reach any other.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, among the uncertainties which seem to hang about the phrase in the Constitution, "uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy," there are at least a few certainties; and the first is that before the Constitution was adopted each one of the States, in virtue of its sovereign power, and each one of them claimed that power, had authority to establish bankrupt laws. Each State had power to establish any system of bankrupt laws that it might see fit; and it is a historical fact, which I presume the Senator from Illinois will not deny, that systems of bankrupt laws did exist anterior to the Constitution, and that there was a dissimilarity between every two of those systems existing in the States. In short, there was a want of uniformity in the bankrupt laws existing within the United States of America before the adoption of the Constitution; and beside that, each State exercised its authority in regard to the collection of debts so as to exempt from final process certain portions of the debtor's property, real or personal, or both.

Both these powers have been exercised since the adoption of the Constitution, for every State has from time to time had its separate system of bankruptcy and its separate system of laws for the collection of debts. Each State, as I have remarked, may exempt from final process whatever property it sees fit, and having the ordinary legislative power that pertains to a government, and being itself a government, it is not to be presumed that it will exercise this power wantonly or injuriously to its own citizens or to persons who are not its citizens. The whole system of bankruptcy and the system for the collection of debts have been under the complete control of the various State Legislatures and are so now.

Now, I wish to put a question to my learned friend from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, in order to ascertain whether he and I view this clause in the same light. The committee propose to strike out of the bill the clause exempting from the operation of the surrender of the bankrupt's effects the particular property specified in the bill:

And such other property not included in the foregoing exceptions as is exempted from levy and sale upon execution by the laws of the State in which the bankrupt has his domicile at the time of the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy to an amount not exceeding that allowed by such State exemption laws in force in the year 1861.

This clause recognizes the existence and continuing force of the exemption laws of the various States as it stands. Now, if we strike out this clause, I ask the Senator whether or not all the property thus exempted by State laws will be included among the assets of the bankrupt and subject to sale according to the provisions of this bill, and pass from his possession and enjoyment into the hands of his creditors? I give it that construction. The expunging from the bill of this clause is intended by the committee, and is understood by the committee, as a complete nullification of all the exemption laws established by the States. Such will be undoubtedly the effect of striking out the clause.

Now, sir, I entertain the opinion that it is not competent for Congress to interfere with the exemption laws of the States. I hold that that is one of the rights and powers pertaining to the States under the Constitution to make such exemptions, and that it belongs to the category of State powers in the same sense in which the power to collect debts, to make contracts, conveyances of land, wills, and all other commercial instruments, and instruments relating to the title of the property owned by the citizens of the State. Congress has no power over this vast field of subjects; and I hold that when the Constitution speaks of "establishing uniform laws upon the subject of bankruptcy," it is to be understood in the sense that the laws which Congress pass shall have a uniform operation and effect throughout the States, making no exception of one State or part of a State from the operation of the act; that the general act shall operate with uniformity throughout all the States, in order to take away and remove the difficulty which existed before the formation of the Constitution, consisting in a want of uniformity of the bankrupt laws of the various States. The clause is to be interpreted rather in a territorial than a commercial sense; it is intended to extend the same general system throughout the United States, and to take away from the States the power of establishing each for itself a separate system of bankruptcy, which may be different from every other system known in the States.

That is the light in which I read the Constitution. Now, sir, I can never consent that all the property exempted from final process in my State—and the exemption in my State is fixed and established by a clause of the constitution of the State itself—shall be swept into the vortex of the bankrupt's assets and sold at public auction. I do not believe Congress have power thus to interfere with the internal policy of a State. I do not believe any such thing was intended by the framers of the Constitution; but it was intended to leave to the States, under what we call a uniform system of bankruptcy, the full and complete control of all matters connected with their internal policy and domestic legislation.

But, sir, I will not occupy the time of the Senate further upon this subject. I have no doubt about the constitutionality of this clause which is now sought to be stricken out, and I am free to say that rather than see such an attempt to sweep away a whole system of exemption laws existing in my own State succeed I shall vote against the bill. I do not think the people of my State or the people of any other State will quietly endure the monstrous injustice which would flow from such an enactment.

Mr. CONNESS. I will not, in the presence of distinguished legal gentlemen in the Senate, undertake to enter into a discussion of the constitutional principle involved in this question, which has already been discussed by Senators; but I represent in part a State which has a great interest in the pending provision. We have in California an exemption law, as it is termed, that provides for an exemption of $5,000, or a homestead of that value to the debtor, if a man of family, and I should dislike very much to see Congress pass any act interfering with the right of the people of that State to make such a provision for the homesteads of families the heads of which have been unfortunate in business.

Without undertaking to express an opinion on the subject, I incline to the belief that the honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee of this body is not correct in the point he has raised as to the non-uniformity of the bill without this amendment. I think the question of uniformity does not go to the matter of the amount exempted; but, on the contrary, the State exemption is rather in the nature of a police regulation in this, that what is exempt in one State may not in any manner constitute a sufficiency in another State. For instance, the homestead exemption law of the State of Vermont, as has been stated, sets apart in such a case $500 worth of property, while in California the amount is $5,000 in value. The California law was passed during the early history of that State, when $5,000 worth of property would go no further in providing a homestead for a family than $500 would in the State of Vermont; and, although things have equalized in that State to a greater extent now than at the date of the passage of that act, yet the people of that State have become used to the amount of this exemption, and there is no disposition that I know of at the present time in that State to interfere with it or to lessen the amount. It is rather viewed as a wise enactment, because the law making the exemption $5,000 is a notice to all mankind, to every person who deals with a citizen of California, that that amount is exempt by law, and nobody is cheated by it, nobody is injured, while an amount sufficient for a homestead for the protection of the family is retained to the unfortunate debtor.

Now, sir, who so wise, who so competent, to determine how much shall constitute a sufficient exemption as the local Legislature of each State? Shall we assume that Congress can provide here a uniform amount, no matter what that amount may be, and determine that it will be sufficient in the State of Vermont and equally so in the State of California? Certainly no person will contend that that could be done, or that Congress could act wisely in such a matter. So that the proposition goes to the question whether or not there shall be an extension in favor of the family.

It appears clear to my mind, as I before observed, that the exemption is more in the nature of a police regulation, a local right that can be more wisely and more directly exercised by the Legislature of each State than it possibly can be by Congress. I therefore incline to the belief that the question of the uniformity of the law is not involved in the provision that shall be made for the debtor's family. I am very free to say that as the bill came from the House, without the amendment proposed, I shall vote for it; but if the amendment be adopted I cannot consent to vote for it, nor to repeal the provision which the people of California have, as I think wisely, made and which they feel disposed to preserve.

The point made by the honorable Senator from Indiana, that the bankrupt may proceed in bankruptcy under the State bankrupt laws, and thereby not avail himself of the provisions of this law, but avail himself of any provision made by the State laws in the way of exemption to the family, loses its force entirely when it is known that this is a compulsory bankrupt law. It is both voluntary and compulsory. Under this bill, as I understand it, if it shall become a law, the creditors may compel the debtor into bankruptcy, and as a matter of course the question arises at once as to the power of the congressional or the State law, so that when proceedings in bankruptcy were taken by virtue of State laws the debtor would be entitled to one class of treatment in the disposition of his affairs, while if proceedings were taken under this act, if it shall become a law, he would be entitled to altogether another disposition. I am not now advised whether this bill goes to the extent of repealing all State laws on the subject of bankruptcy. I presume not; but that if it passes it will become the universal law of bankruptcy, or the one most availed of, I think there need be scarcely a doubt.

For the reasons presented I shall vote against the amendment reported by the committee, and if it shall obtain, I shall feel compelled to vote against the passage of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, there can be no doubt as to the authority of Congress to pass a bankrupt law, the power to do so being in so many words conferred upon Congress; and I do not understand as far as the debate has gone, that the bill itself is objected to upon any ground of expediency. In the present condition of the country, growing out of the troubles in which we have been involved, it has seemed to me from the first not only important but actually humane to provide a system of bankruptcy. I do not know what are the debts now due by those who are unable to pay in that part of the country where for the most part debtors are to be found: the debts no doubt are so heavy and the debtors are to be found in almost every portion of the country, that it will be impossible for them to exercise their industry or have any motive to exercise their industry or engage in any enterprise if everything they may earn can be seized at once and they be forced to poverty again. The only doubt, therefore, as far as the debate has gone, as to the propriety of passing this bill is because of the provision of the fourteenth section which the Judiciary Committee have reported should be stricken out.

As the Senate, I believe, are already advised, the members of the committee were not all of them of that opinion. I was one of the minority, and I will state now very briefly the ground upon which I supposed the section to be constitutional.

The word "laws" as found in the clause is evidently meant as synonymous with the word "rule," as found in the same clause in relation to naturalization. Congress is authorized "to establish a uniform rule of naturalization and uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy." If the "rule" in the first case is to operate everywhere in the same way, that is to say if the rule is the same, the uniformity contemplated by the Constitution in relation to naturalization is accomplished; and for the same reason if the bankrupt law which Congress may pass operates alike as a law everywhere throughout the United States, the uniformity contemplated by the provision is accomplished.

The objection stated by my friend, the chairman of the committee, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] and the honorable member from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS,] that the particular provision shows that the law itself will not be uniform in the sense of the constitutional clause, is not that it is not the same law in each State of the Union if it shall pass, but because what may be recovered under it in one State will not be what may be recovered under it in another State. In the same section—and I do not understand the Judiciary Committee or the chairman as finding any fault with that provision; certainly they have not recommended any change in that particular—in the same section which excepts from the operation of the bankrupt act property which is reserved by the laws of the States there are other exceptions which are to remain. There are two classes: the first class embraces property which the circumstances of the bankrupt may, in the judgment of the commissioner or of the district court, justify being retained by him. The decisions in relation to bankrupts under that clause by the commissioner may lead to different results. One amount may be allowed to one bankrupt because of his circumstances and the condition in which he is placed, and another amount may be allowed to another bankrupt because his condition and his circumstances are not the same; so that the bill in that clause of it goes upon the assumption that there may be a different result in the case of different applicants for the bankrupt law, or different parties against whom the bankrupt law may be put in operation by compulsion. But that is not all. It excepts from the operation of the bankruptcy all property belonging to the bankrupt which he holds under any act of Congress, or rather which by any act of Congress is excepted from execution. Then my friend here holds property—and it is immaterial what the property may be, for an act of Congress may exempt any property they think proper—he owns property which is exempted from execution under an act of Congress; he lives alongside of me; that property of his cannot be taken. I own property not greater in point of value which the exception does not embrace; my property can be taken.

Property is excepted by act of Congress from seizure for debt in the State of Michigan, and there happens to be no such property within the limits of the State of Maryland. All the property that the Maryland debtors held can be taken, but the property which the Michigan debtors held, if it be property covered by the exception, cannot be taken; so that the law in that particular operates one way practically in Michigan and another way practically in Maryland. That is to say, the Michigan debtor continues, notwithstanding his bankruptcy, the owner of his property; the Maryland debtor is not the owner because it is not excepted by the act of Congress.

Before the decision in the case of Sturgis vs. Crowninshield, reported in 4 Wheaton, it was a very general opinion that the States had the authority to pass bankrupt laws, or at least insolvent laws that might result in the same way. It was not until that decision that it was decided that the right of the States to pass laws of that kind was disputed. In the subsequent case of Ogden vs. Saunders, reported in 12 Wheaton, another question arose. The case of Sturgis vs. Crowninshield was decided on the ground that an insolvent law of a State freeing the debtor from all his debts was invalid because of the inhibition in the Constitution of the United States against a State passing laws impairing the obligation of contracts. The court held in that case that the States might pass laws which would affect the remedy, and as under the laws as they existed in the States or in the United States one of the remedies left to the creditor to enforce the collection of his debt as against the debtor was imprisonment; they could pass a law relieving a debtor from imprisonment, but they could not pass a law relieving him from the obligation to pay the debts or discharging from liability because of that obligation any property that he might thereafter acquire.

In the second case the question was presented whether a State law which discharged a debtor from all obligation for his debts was valid as between himself and a citizen creditor upon a debt contracted subsequent to the passage of the State law; and the Supreme Court held by a majority that such a law would be valid; and they further decided in deciding that case that there was nothing to prohibit a State from passing a bankrupt law or an insolvent law in the mere existence of the power conferred upon Congress on the subject until Congress should exercise the power, and then that the State law would be valid unless it was found actually to conflict with the provisions of the bankrupt law of the United States.

Now, Mr. President, I will not state as strongly as I should otherwise have done that, in my judgment, the objection is wholly unfounded, constitutionally, because the honorable chairman and those who concurred with him upon the committee think that it is a very clear and well-founded objection; but for the soul of me, irrespective of that authority, I cannot imagine what charge of want of uniformity there is in a law which operates as a law alike in every State in the Union. The law in Maryland is, that whatever is exempted by her own laws from execution is to be exempt. The law in Maine is, that whatever is exempted, if she has an exemption law in that State, is to be exempted from the operation of this law. It operates alike. It does not exempt property to the like amount; but it operates as a law equally in the one State as in the other.

Now, suppose that in point of fact—and that is a way, I think, to test it—there were exemption laws in every State, and the amount of the exemption was precisely the same in each State, and this law proposed to give the benefit of that exemption to all the bankrupts, would it not be uniform? It would be uniform, then, because it would operate alike everywhere in one respect; it would save from execution property of a like amount in each State. But the idea is that if there happens to be a difference in the amount of property which the States have respectively exempted from taxation that of itself shows, if we retain this clause, that the law will not operate uniformly. Now, Mr. President, the whole effect, as I think, of the bill is this: the creditors now of these bankrupts are prohibited from making their debts out of a certain description of property; that is all. They have no relief, therefore, anywhere, for these exemption laws have been recognized as constitutional, and being constitutional the only way in which they can be avoided, if they can be avoided at all, is to strike at them by means of a bankrupt law, and that we cannot do unless we desire to appropriate to the payment of debts property which is not liable to the payment of debts under the existing State laws, unless we place in the hands of the creditor property belonging to his debtor to which now he has no recourse, being protected by the State laws. The whole effect, therefore, of this provision is, that we give to the creditor all that the creditor can obtain; and as I said, and for the same reason, the operation of the law is everywhere the same.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not propose to enter into the discussion of this question, but it is a very important one, and I suppose one upon the decision of which the votes of a good many Senators on the bill itself will depend. I should like to know of the Senator from Vermont whether or not, if this bill shall be enacted into a law, as he desires that it shall be, it will be possible for any of the States to change their exemption laws. For example, suppose that in the State of Iowa there is an exemption of $1,000 and in the State of Illinois of $5,000; we have a community of interests; our population are embarked in about the same character of business; and there is about a uniform amount of wealth probably distributed among the population. If the interests of Iowa, in the opinion of our General Assembly, required that our exemption law should be made to correspond with that of the State of Illinois, would it be possible for us to increase the exemption from $1,000 to $5,000, so as to correspond with that of Illinois?

Then I should like to have him answer me whether or not, if this bill shall pass, it will be possible for the State of Nebraska, for example, that will come into the Union a week after the approval of this law without any exemption law, to establish a homestead exemption law, and exclude from the operation of the Federal bankrupt law such descriptions of property as, in the opinion of the General Assembly of that State, the welfare of the State may require, but which is not provided for in the bankrupt law? And I should like to know whether or not it will be possible for any of the States that have not now upon their statute-books provisions for homestead exemptions, and do not place them there before the enactment of this bankrupt bill into a law, to do so afterward?

Mr. POLAND. Mr. President, I hardly know by what right the Senator from Iowa requires my opinion upon the questions he puts, more than that of any other Senator. It is true that by the peculiar condition in which this bill was placed in the Committee on the Judiciary who have had it in charge it fell to me to report the bill as the organ of a majority of that committee to the Senate. The subject is one that I have never very deeply studied. The bill itself is one that originated in the House of Representatives and passed there, and is the work in the main, as I understand, of a Representative from Rhode Island, a gentleman who has given very great attention to the subject, [Mr. JENCKES.]

So far as regards the question that the Senator puts, as to whether, if this bill shall become a law with this provision in it as it came from the House, it will be in the power of the State Legislatures to make future exemptions different from what are provided for in this bill, I am of the opinion—if it will do the Senator any good or any harm—that they will not have the power; that this bill will cover the whole ground, and that it will not be in the power of the Legislatures of the several States afterward to make additional and greater provisions, so that a bankrupt could retain property against his creditors under a proceeding under this law by virtue of those future exemptions.

In relation to the admission of new States and what may be done hereafter, those are matters that I have not considered at all, and the gentleman's opinion is just as good on that subject as mine. I am not aware that it would elucidate the question that is before the Senate if I were prepared to give the Senator my own opinion on the subject.

While I am up, Mr. President, let me say a word in reference to the pending question. When the bill was before the Senate some two weeks ago I gave my own view, in a few words, in relation to it, and as to whether this provision in the bill rendered it unconstitutional so that it was not a uniform system of bankruptcy within the meaning of that term in the Constitution of the United States. The objection is, that because these State exemption laws are different in their terms, the laws of one State exempting more in favor of the debtor and his family than the laws of another State, therefore the system is not uniform. It seems to me that the bill is not open to this objection, even with this provision in the bill as it passed the House. I am aware, as has been stated by several Senators, that the provisions of the laws of the several States are different in this respect. Some of them exempt a larger number and value of articles of personal property than others. There is a very considerable difference in the amount of real estate that a debtor or his family may retain against his creditors. The New England rule is $500; in New York it is $1,000; in the western States it is still larger; in the Pacific States it is larger still, going as high in the State of California, as the Senator from California has told us, as $5,000.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that there is very great force in the suggestion that was made by the Senator from California in relation to this very subject: that while the Legislatures of the several States intended to provide for a poor debtor that he should retain such an amount of personal property and such a home for his family as was necessary to keep them alive, furnish them a reasonable and comfortable home, the amount and value of property that is required for that purpose is very different in different localities, in different portions of our large, extended country, and the Legislatures of the several States in providing how much should answer that requirement had only made this equal; and when Congress say that a person who goes into bankruptcy, or who is forced into bankruptcy under the provisions of this bill, shall be entitled to this amount of real and personal property for the support of himself and family, they have referred to a rule which is made equal by the Legislatures of the several States, varying according to the different circumstances of each.

But however that may be, whether the idea is a sound one or not, it seems to me clear that the rule which this bill establishes is a uniform one. Now, it is not questioned but what the Legislatures of the several States have a right to pass these exemption laws. The general current of decisions in the State courts has been that they have a right to exempt property, either real or personal, from debts that already exist. There have been individual decisions in some of the State courts that an exemption law was not valid so far as it regarded a debt that then existed; but the great majority in the current of decisions in the State courts has been that these exemptions, larger exemptions of personal or real property, were valid even as against existing debts. I am aware that there is not an entire uniformity of decisions upon that subject; but the general power of the States to pass exemption laws has never been questioned, and it is perfectly well settled and established throughout the country.

Now, what does this bill propose to do? What does the section of the bill which is now in question propose? Merely this: that we pass a bankrupt law, we establish a system of bankruptcy, by which every dollar of property in every State that is subject to the man's debts may be taken and appropriated. It administers upon the property of every bankrupt throughout the entire country, and takes all his property that is by the existing law subject to the payment of his debts. In that respect it is certainly a uniform system; and it seems to me that that is all that can be required of Congress in order to make the system uniform. Whether it is in our power, whether we may entirely uproot these homestead exemption laws in the different States, is not now in question; but, in my judgment, we may preserve them and still retain such uniformity as to make our bankrupt law valid under the existing provision of the Constitution of the United States. It is certainly very desirable to do so. No laws that have been passed by the States have met with more favor in every community than these laws in favor of poor debtors, exempting property both real and personal, and especially exempting realty, that is, what has been termed the homestead laws of the different States. There are no laws in all the States to which the people are more attached, none that have been more beneficial in their operation.

As I had occasion to say the other day, if those laws must be uprooted, if they must be cast aside in order to make room for a bankrupt law, of course it is idle to ask either this body or the other House of Congress to pass a bankrupt law. In the condition of things in this country and under the State legislation it has become impossible to have a general bankrupt law unless we can have one with such a provision in it as this bill contains. It is perfectly certain that without this provision a bankrupt bill cannot be passed, and if it cannot be passed with such a provision as this in it without being subject to the objection that is made by the chairman of the committee and by other gentlemen, then we must go without it.

Considerable stress seemed to be laid by the Senator from Illinois upon the fact that this portion of this section had been struck out by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate. It perhaps may withdraw some of the force of that statement when it is known that it was by a bare majority of that committee that this was struck out.

Mr. McDUGALL. Mr. President, the question now before the Senate is a pure question of law as to the power of legislation in the Government; a question whether this is a general law, or whether it is one of those things that are exceptional. I always dislike to disagree with the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, for whom I have great respect; but I understand that as a general law, passed for the benefit of all citizens, it comes within the general purview of the powers of Congress. I make a single expression for the purpose of communicating my idea as to that single point.

Then more, I desire to say, and I am only about repeating what I have said some years since, there is no civilized Government in Europe that has not such a law. The provision in relation to the power to pass such a law was placed in the Constitution of the United States by persons who understood that it was necessary to carry on commerce and the relations of merchants in that way. It was attempted in 1813, and by ignorant legislation it had to be repealed. It was again repeated in 1841, and then by carelessness and inconsiderate action it had to be repealed shortly afterward. Those two facts having been a part of our political history, most politicians were afraid to vote for a bankrupt bill, not understanding, I think, that to give the creditor his right and the debtor his right and to settle controversies was an obligation to impose upon the people and that the Government should impose. In the war of 1812 the country was bankrupted, and some of the ablest and best men were placed within prison bounds, and they had great difficulty to get means enough to support their families. Some of the most able men were prevented from engaging in large enterprises to develop the resources of the country. It has thus continued from that time until this time, although it was worse then than it is now.

This law has been called for by all legislation of high, intelligent States. It was provided for in the Constitution of 1787. It has been promised by every party in the country. It is pledged by the Republican party, pledged by the Democratic party, as a thing due to the people, and I have long sought to see the thing done, having been in office and taken some interest in these things for more than a decade. I trust that the conduct of this matter may be left to the gentleman who reports the measure from the committee, and I think we can all trust his judgment.

Mr. RAMSEY. Mr. President, I have ever been in favor of a bankrupt law. I simply rise to state that if this amendment be adopted, and this provision securing the exemptions provided for by the States be stricken out, I certainly cannot vote for the bill. We have in our State a very moderate exemption, consisting, I think, of eighty acres of land in the country or a town lot in a city or town, and upon these little sanctuaries families have enshrined themselves. Driven out by the exactions and persecutions of heartless creditors in the East, they have sought an asylum in the West, and by these liberal laws of our States have been protected. The purpose of the committee now is to destroy this protection. For myself, I shall vote against the amendment, and if it shall be adopted I shall vote against the whole bill on its passage.

Mr. STEWART. I shall vote against striking out this exemption and against this amendment of the committee, although in committee I am not certain which way I did vote. I wish to state the reason why I am inclined to vote against the report of the committee. I regard it as a matter of great importance to have a bankrupt law passed. I believe that it will relieve a great many persons who are in a hopeless condition without it; I believe the country needs it; I believe that at the present time it would relieve a great many enterprising men who would thereby be enabled to add to the wealth of the country. It is desirable that they should be liberated, if it can be done. On the other hand, these homestead exemption laws have so far entered into the system of the country, particularly in the West and on the Pacific, and have operated so beneficially, that it will be a great calamity to disturb them. I am satisfied that if it is necessary to disturb them the bill will not become a law. Inasmuch as there is a very serious question whether the Judiciary Committee are not mistaken, whether this law cannot be passed, whether it will not be enforced by the courts—a grave question which must ultimately be determined by the courts—I am in favor of retaining the clause and allowing the courts to pass upon it. If declared unconstitutional, there would be no great harm done; if declared constitutional, the bankrupt law will be in harmony with our homestead exemption laws and will be satisfactory to everybody. I consider it so important to have a bankrupt law and so important to retain our homestead exemption laws, and the question being acknowledged by all to be a question of considerable doubt, I think we had better retain the clause so as to bring the question before the courts and have it determined. I wish to retain the clause in order that the courts may determine whether, consistent with our established system of homestead laws in the States which are working beneficially, we can have a bankrupt bill at all. It is the only way to bring it before the courts and have it determined, and I am in favor of doing it.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator says he is going to vote for this proposition so that the courts may decide upon the question; and if they decide that it is unconstitutional no great harm will be done. Why, sir, if they decide it to be unconstitutional the effect will be, as I understand, to sweep away the State exemptions in favor of debtors, to take that property which the State has exempted and turn it into the fund of the assignee designated to administer upon the bankrupt's estate. It seems to me that this is a graver question than my friend from Nevada seems to think it is. If we pass the law without any provision in regard to homesteads, or without saying that there shall be an exemption of such an amount, fixing whatever amount that may be; if, in other words, we pass the law as the Senator from Vermont desires us to pass it, and the courts decide it to be unconstitutional, then all our homestead exemption laws are swept out from under us.

Mr. STEWART. I do not think that that will be the effect. It seems to me that if it is declared unconstitutional because it is not a uniform system that goes to the whole law, and consequently there will be no harm done. They say the law is not a uniform system of bankruptcy.

Mr. GRIMES. It seems to me that the proper way to set this forever at rest and to enable us to understand ourselves what we are going to do, and for our constituents to know what we have done; is to incorporate into the bill some provision declaring that such exemptions shall exist in all the States.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is the bill, but this is an addition.

Mr. GRIMES. That will cover the amount of the homesteads in the States.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The difficulty about that was that in the Pacific States the exemption is $5,000. They are not willing to reduce that, as a general rule, and it is so various we found it impossible.

Mr. McDUGALL. General laws are not particular laws, and in legislating for a Government we have to legislate with reference to the interests of localities. Now, speaking about the law of California, a $5,000 homestead there would not be more than $500 in some countries that I know; that is, as regards enough for the protection of the family.

Mr. GRIMES. Let no gentleman flatter himself that the Supreme Court, if they decide that this clause is unconstitutional, are going to decide that the whole law is unconstitutional.

Mr. JOHNSON. Why not?

Mr. GRIMES. I am satisfied they will not. They will decide that the law is uniform in all respects, but is not uniform in this respect, inasmuch as we, in this particular, had no authority to pass it.

Mr. McDUGALL. That will have to be the result of a conclusion, and it cannot be determined by exceptional questions.

Mr. DAVIS. My own opinion upon this point is, that Congress has no competence or power to pass any bankrupt bill that is not uniform, and that a clause adopting the various systems of exemptions of property from execution in satisfaction of debts by the different States would establish a system not uniform, and that it would consequently have the effect of vitiating and rendering void the whole law. I have no doubt that Congress may exempt what property it pleases in a bankrupt law in favor of the bankrupt, but the system of exemptions ought to be uniform throughout all the States according to my understanding of the requisition of the Constitution. There cannot be a system of exemptions amounting to $500 in one State and $5,000 in another State in a constitutional bankrupt law. If gentlemen want a bankrupt law, and at the same time a reservation of exemptions from execution and satisfaction of debt by State laws, they must in the bankrupt law make a uniform provision to cover such exemptions, and I think that unless they adopt that course the law will not be uniform and constitutional.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the yeas and nays have not been called I ask for them on this question?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish the question may be again stated, so that it may be clearly understood. In my opinion it is a subject of great importance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was on page 17, section fourteen, after the word "States," in line one hundred and twenty-seven, to strike out the following clause:

And such other property not included in the foregoing exceptions as is exempted from levy and sale upon execution by the laws of the State in which the bankrupt has his domicile at the time of commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, to an amount not exceeding that allowed by such State exemption laws in force in the year 1864.

Mr. HOWARD. If this clause shall be stricken out, then it will follow that all the exemption laws of the several States and every clause of every State constitution which secures an exemption from seizure of the property of a debtor on final process, will, if the construction given it by the Judiciary Committee be sound, be ipso facto repealed. In my State we have settled and fixed the right of the owner of property to an exemption from final process by incorporating it in the constitution itself of the State. The people of that State have inserted in their fundamental law a provision that—

"The personal property of every resident of this State, to consist of such property only as shall be designated by law, shall be exempted to the amount of not less than $500 from sale on execution or other final process of any court, issued for the collection of any debt contracted after the adoption of this constitution."

The exemption of personal property cannot be less in value than $500 under the constitution of the State. Again, the constitution declares:

"Every homestead of not exceeding forty acres of land, and the dwelling-house thereon, and the appurtenances, to be selected by the owner thereof, and not included in any town, plat, city, or village; or instead thereof, at the option of the owner, any lot in any city, village, or recorded town plat, or such parts of lots as shall be equal thereto, and the dwelling-house thereon, and its appurtenances, owned and occupied by any resident of the State, not exceeding in value $1,500, shall be exempt from forced sale on execution, or any other final process from a court, for any debt contracted after the adoption of this constitution. Such exemption shall not extend to any mortgage thereon lawfully obtained, but such mortgage or other alienation of such land by the owner thereof, if a married man, shall not be valid without the signature of the wife to the same."

So that as to the homestead in my State it cannot be mortgaged or in any way alienated by the husband who is the owner of the land during the life of his wife without her consent; and the same constitution provides that this homestead shall not be sold for the payment of the debts of the deceased until after all his children shall have become of age. We have laid this principle of a reasonable, fair exemption from sale upon execution deep in the foundations of society.

Now, sir, I cannot consent to disturb that arrangement. I presume that similar provisions are in force in other States. I hold it to be the right of each State, in the exercise of its constitutional authority, to regulate all these matters of domestic, internal police, and that Congress have no power whatever to interfere or disturb them. I would not attempt it. I cannot therefore vote to strike out this clause of the bill, because it would stand as an evidence that I had yielded my opinion upon the effect of the constitution and upon the rights of the several States. I do not wish to invite a multitude of law suits to test the question in every case where a bankrupt is proceeding to obtain the benefit of the act; and such will be one of the direct consequences of striking out this clause. You will invite innumerable law suits, controversies between creditors and the wives and children of bankrupts; and my prediction is, that if this clause shall be stricken out, the law will in the course of five years, if it shall last so long, be as odious to the community generally as any act ever passed by Congress.

Mr. President, I remember quite well how great a clamor was raised for the passage of the bankrupt act in 1841. Congress, yielding to what they supposed to be the honest desires of the people, enacted a bankrupt law. My friend from Indiana [Mr. LANE] will recollect it very well. We were both present in the other House and voted for it; and within about one year from the time we enacted that law the same Congress repealed it. It is possible this bill may be an improvement upon the act of 1841; but my own experience under that act was such, in the course of my professional practice, as to create in my mind a very strong distrust of the value of any general bankrupt law that could be passed by Congress. I do not say that I shall vote against the present bill should the Senate not strike out this clause and should they retain another clause which I propose to strike out when we reach it. We ought to move carefully. There is no commercial interest in this country that is not to be affected by it if it shall become a law. There is not a family in the land, nor an individual, who will not in some degree feel it, and in uncounted cases feel it most sensibly and deeply.

I hope, sir, this clause will be retained. Let us endeavor to preserve to the citizens of the various States some little vestige of the privileges and immunities which their own State Legislatures and people have seen fit to grant them, and do not let us throw the whole property of the debtor class throughout the United States into the immense vortex of bankruptcy, to be administered upon, and, in most cases, as it will turn out, utterly wasted and destroyed in the course of the proceeding.

Mr. HENDERSON. Is it in order to amend the lines proposed to be stricken out before the vote is taken on striking out?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. HENDERSON. I propose to amend, then, by striking out in the thirty-second and thirty-third lines the words "in the year 1864" and inserting "at the time when such proceeding shall have been commenced."

Mr. POLAND. I hope the Senator will withdraw his amendment for the present. I should myself be in favor of the amendment that he proposes; but the question now stands upon the principle: whether we shall adopt the State exemptions. He can amend it afterward if it is retained. This amendment is to strike out merely.

Mr. HENDERSON. My only object was this: if it is to be adopted at all, it should be adopted so as to have—

Mr. POLAND. The Senator's amendment will be in order afterward, if the clause be not stricken out.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not wish to interfere.

Mr. POLAND. I hope the vote will be taken on the amendment to strike out the clause.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri withdraw his motion to amend?

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, the farmers, mechanics, and laboring men of the country have very little interest, I take it, in the passage of this bill. It is intended for the aid of men engaged in business in some form who have been unfortunate. If it was to operate in the future, I would not care how large the amount of property was that was to be exempted. If it was intended by exempting a large amount of property to discourage men from getting in debt, I think it would be a great blessing to the country; for I look upon credits, as a general rule, in this country as one of the greatest evils that afflict it, and especially for the young men of the country, who are apt to run in debt for their daily living. I should be perfectly willing that any one who gave that kind of credit should rest solely and entirely upon the good faith and the character of the person he trusted, and have no advantages of law of any kind to aid him in it. But, sir, I wish to inquire whether it would be in order to move to strike out all after the words "United States," in the twenty-fourth line, down to the word "provided," in the thirty-third line, which is the clause proposed to be stricken out by the committee, and to insert an amendment covering the part proposed to be stricken out and a portion of the other?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks it would.

Mr. WILSON. I make the motion then to strike out those words and to insert:

And a homestead or other property not exceeding in value $2,000.

That will include furniture and wearing apparel.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is all exempted now by this section.

Mr. WILSON. I know, but in addition this amendment will give a homestead or other property not exceeding in value $2,000. I think that will be little enough and will make it uniform throughout the country; and if we have got any persons in the country who are entitled to hold property to the amount of several thousands of dollars under State laws it seems to me they should surrender that right to a certain extent to enable us to get a uniform law.

Mr. McDougall. What might make a home in one place might not make it in another.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am in favor of making a homestead exemption in this law. I see the difficulty in the way of striking out the clause and not saying anything about the homestead or providing that it shall be regulated by State laws. At the same time the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts is not sufficiently definite. We have a homestead exemption law in Ohio and there are many cases arising under it that have come to my knowledge. Take this case: suppose the homestead on which a man resides is worth $2,500; would you deprive him entirely of the homestead, or would you sell it and pay him the $2,000, or allow him to keep it and require him to pay interest on the excess? There are many cases of that kind that ought to be provided for if the Senate adopt this principle. Now, there are cases where the State laws make a distinction between lands. If the homestead is in the country, or agricultural land, you must limit the number of acres of land; you cannot limit its value very well. So that, if this principle is adopted, the bill itself ought to be recommitted to the Judiciary Committee with a view to make the various exceptions and qualifications to carry out this idea. If adopted in this form it would create embarrassment.

Mr. CONNESS. This is an unhappy attempt at a compromise, as I view it, and I hope it will not be adopted. I believe that is all the speech I have to make upon it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not propose to make any remarks further than to say that on the question of the perfect right of Congress to pass a bankrupt bill containing a similar provision to this I have no doubt at all. The idea of some gentlemen is that the law to be uniform must be equal in its operations. I do not hold to that idea at all. If we make a rule which operates upon the States equally, that is to say, which is equal in its terms so far as the States are concerned, it would not be unconstitutional, simply because owing to the particular provisions of the several States the operation would not be precisely similar. I think, therefore, there is no objection to passing a bankrupt law establishing a principle of exemption which should apply, not only to what may be at present exempted by the States, but what may hereafter be so exempted, if Congress saw fit so to prescribe. The provision of the Constitution unquestionably was intended to apply to the several States to prevent any distinction being made between them. I think, however, any provision we agree to on this subject should be pretty carefully worded. I do not approve of specifying any exemption particularly, whether it is to be a homestead or anything else. If the laws of a particular State allow a homestead and the laws of another State do not, so be it. It is not worth while to pass a law that shall define what may not exist in any particular State, and compel the State to conform its laws to it.

That this exemption substantially—I am not particular as to its terms—ought to be made I have no doubt, and without it I should not vote for the bill, for the simple reason that there is probably not a State in the Union, or hardly any one, that has not exemption laws. The people of the several States have become accustomed to these exemption laws; they hold property of one description or another, real or personal, under them; and to attempt to pass a law of Congress which shall disturb all people in the possession of that property would be so odious in its effect that the law, in my own judgment, would be repealed in a very short space of time. The result would be to create a confusion and a sensibility in the people of the States that would be an effectual bar to its perfect and wise and just operation.

I hope, therefore, that the clause will not be stricken out, although it is susceptible of amendment and should be made more definite, and then it should pass. As I have always been in favor of a general bankrupt law, and think one ought to exist and that it is very much to our discredit that we have not had one in operation for a great many years, I shall vote probably for the bill; but if the effect of the bill is to unsettle all the laws of the States and property held under the laws of the several States for a series of years, to which the people have become accustomed, I certainly could not consent to anything of that sort.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not propose to participate in the discussions upon this bill, as I intend to vote against it in any event; but I will simply say, so far as this amendment is concerned, that I concur with the chairman of the Judiciary Committee in his opinion that this part of the bill is unconstitutional. Suppose this bill provided in express terms that in the State of Iowa a homestead worth $5,000 should be exempt from execution, and that in the State of Illinois a homestead worth $500 should be exempt from execution, will anybody say that that would be a uniform law? That is what this bill does, because it adopts the legislative enactments of the different States, and some of those enactments provide that $5,000 worth of real estate shall be exempt from execution and others provide that $500 worth of real estate shall be exempt from execution, and there is no way that the law can be made uniform if these different and conflicting acts of the several States are adopted and made a part of the law. Now, to undertake to say that a law is uniform which in fact is not uniform in its operation it seems to me is sticking in the bark.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. Suppose it is stated that there should be $5,000 worth of real estate, as an illustration, set apart in each State of the Union for a homestead for the family; would that be uniform in its operation? That would be constitutional, would it not? If it fixed the same amount of real estate to be set apart in each State of the Union for the homestead, say $5,000 or $500, that would be uniform.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Could not the Senator illustrate it by supposing that the law provided for ten acres of land, which might be much more valuable in one State than another?

Mr. STEWART. Yes; suppose it said ten acres of land. That would be a uniform amount—uniform in quantity—but it certainly would not be uniform in its practical operation. Suppose you said $5,000 worth of real estate: that would be uniform in the amount of valuation, but in its practical operation it would not be uniform, because $5,000 in some States would be a very handsome estate and in other States would not buy a country place. One thousand dollars in some States would furnish a good home; in others it would not amount to anything. For instance, in the State of California it would not buy a home at all, whereas in Vermont it would. So that to have the law absolutely uniform in its practical operation is impossible. That was not intended, in my opinion, by the Constitution of the United States. Any kind of an exemption in the law must have a different practical operation in one State from another. This bill adopts the exemptions of the States, and it is presumed that the States have practically protected their citizens according to the circumstances about them; that they have thrown protection around the homestead and around exemptions for the purpose of protecting families about equally; and perhaps it is more uniform in its practical operation for us to follow what the States have fixed, owing to their different circumstances, than it would be to make it arbitrary throughout the United States. Vermont fixes $500 as the exemption; California, $5,000. That in its practical operation is more uniform, if you are going to talk of its practical operation, than it would be to fix an arbitrary amount for each State. So that after all I do not think the object sought to be arrived at by having uniform laws is contravened by this exemption.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, that is a pretty long question which the gentleman has propounded to me, [laughter,] and I am much obliged to him for answering his own question. I suppose that in the legislation of Congress a dollar is regarded as a dollar everywhere throughout the United States. When a law of Congress provides that an exemption everywhere shall extend to $5,000, the law assumes that a dollar of gold or of the currency of the United States is a dollar in California and a dollar in Vermont.

Mr. STEWART. I do not like to interrupt the Senator, but I wish to ask him one more question. Does not Congress every day in its legislation recognize that a dollar in one place is worth more than a dollar in another? Does it not regulate the salaries of officers at different prices for different places? In your revenue law you provide that the officers in one locality shall receive a certain compensation, and in another locality another. The same is true of military officers. You recognize that in one place a dollar is worth more than it is in another, because you give more. You recognize the fact that it costs a man more dollars to live in one locality than in another; and in making your uniform laws you adapt your legislation to the situation of the country, and consequently make allowances of different amounts for the same service in different localities. Practically, therefore, Congress does not treat a dollar as absolutely worth as much in one place as in another, and business men do not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I do not know that there is any constitutional provision as to the power of Congress to regulate salaries in the United States, and therefore Congress can exercise its discretion upon that subject, and the salary is accommodated to the circumstances of the person whose salary is fixed. Some men have larger responsibilities than others; some men are placed in offices where their expenses are larger than the expenses of other men; and so the law regulating salaries is governed by such considerations. That has nothing to do with the question before the Senate; but I undertake to say that Congress has never provided by law that a Treasury note of the United States shall be worth less in one part of the country than in another. Would it not be extraordinary legislation on the part of Congress, after, pursuant to law, a currency has been furnished to the country, for Congress to undertake to declare that this currency was worth less in California than it was in the State of Vermont?

Mr. STEWART. They do not exactly declare that; but they declare it in its practical operation, in making the law uniform, that it requires more of that currency to do the same thing in California than in Vermont; and so with this law. We say that in its practical operations, in order to make the law uniform, it is necessary in the new States that there should be larger exemptions than in the old States, and consequently we adopt the exemptions which the States themselves have provided as the best way to arrive at that uniform result.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not expect to occupy the whole of our remaining time during this session; and I have no doubt the Senator will have an opportunity to make a speech after I conclude, if he is desirous to do so. I do not understand the honorable Senator to say now, and I presume no Senator will say, that if this law did provide expressly that $5,000 worth of property should be exempt from execution in one State and that only $500 worth of property should be exempt in another the law would be uniform. If that would be uniform legislation, then it would be perfectly uniform to say that in one State all property should be exempt, and in another State a certain portion of the property should be exempt. This law undertakes to adopt the legislation of the different States. Will any man say that the legislation of the different States of this Union as to exemptions from execution is uniform? What does "uniform" mean? Does it not mean that the laws are alike, that they operate alike? It is true, no law can be made to operate exactly in one place as it operates in another in every respect, because the circumstances of one locality are different from the circumstances of another locality; but Congress is to make the law as uniform as it can by its legislation; and Congress is not to assume that, because circumstances require it, the law may be made one thing in one State and another thing in another State. The very object of this provision of the Constitution was to require uniformity in legislation.

This bill, if it passes with this provision in it, will extend privileges to citizens of certain States which it denies to citizens of other States. That is the very reason why the Constitution was so made as to require uniform legislation on this subject. What does it mean if it does not mean that when Congress enacts a bankrupt law it shall operate in one State just as it operates in any other State; that Congress shall not undertake to say that Massachusetts, for instance, whether in its legislation or in its circumstances, under the law shall enjoy exemptions and benefits which the people of the State of Iowa do not enjoy? Under this bill, as I understand, the operation of the law in one State may be wholly defeated. If the Legislature of a State sees proper by its legislation to extend its exemption laws it may protect the property of the debtor so as to directly defeat the operation of this law.

Mr. POLAND. It is confined to the State exemptions in 1864.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why is it confined to the State exemptions in 1864? Is it assumed that in 1864 the laws were any more equitable or just? Is this to be a rigid and unchanging rule that is forever to stand? And this very part of the provision requiring the laws of 1864 to remain unchanged answers the arguments which the Senator from Nevada urges, that the State must be allowed to accommodate its legislation to its particular circumstances, and so if prices go up the exemption laws must be changed to accommodate themselves to the prices of the country; and if they go down the exemption laws must be again changed. This bill undertakes to designate a certain time in the history of this country, (and it might as well go back ten or twenty-five years as to go back two,) and declares that the exemption laws of the States in 1864, though they may have been repealed since that time by the States, shall be incorporated into and constitute a part of this bankrupt bill.

My opinion on the subject, without giving it a very thorough examination, is that this provision is unconstitutional. I do not believe in this system of allowing men to go in debt and then exempting them from its payment by any arrangement that operates upon contracts now in existence, I care not whether it be State or congressional legislation. Every man ought to be compelled to pay his debts as a general rule. But if a bankrupt law is to be enacted, in my judgment it should be prospective in its operations; and I would not object to voting for a bankrupt law to operate in futuro if its terms and provisions were such, as I considered constitutional and reasonable.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President—

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Nevada what effect this would have on his State, whether they had any exemption laws in 1864?

Mr. STEWART. As a Territory we had territorial exemption laws, and the State constitution continued those laws in force.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then this bill would leave you in the condition of being without any homestead exemption, because the property exempted is that allowed "by such State exemption laws in force in the year 1864."

Mr. STEWART. We were admitted as a State in the fall of 1864 under a constitution that continued in force the territorial laws previously passed, so that this would operate in my State.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The language is, "allowed by such State exemption laws in force in the year 1864." I was not aware that the State of Nevada was admitted and had State exemption laws in force in 1864.

Mr. STEWART. We had territorial exemption laws, and we were admitted as a State in the fall of 1864 with a constitution that adopted and continued in force the laws passed by the territorial Legislature, thus, of course, continuing in force the territorial exemption laws, so that the State of Nevada comes under this provision.

Now, sir, what is the uniformity which the Constitution requires on this subject? If it means that the bankrupt law passed by Congress shall be uniform in its practical operation; if it means that it shall have the same practical effect in one State as another, I think this bill is probably as near a uniform system as would be the adoption of an arbitrary amount of exemption applied all over the United States. Indeed this bill comes nearer to practical uniformity in the operation of the law than would such a provision, because it is to be taken for granted that the States have regulated their exemptions so that they shall reserve to the debtor about the same amount of the comforts and conveniences of life and afford about the same facility everywhere for reserving a provision for the family. Each State has, it must be presumed, made provision on this subject according to its own peculiar circumstances. For example, in some of the new and distant States and Territories an exemption to the amount of $500 or $1,000 would be of very little use. Where flour is worth a dollar a pound, and other things are in proportion, an exemption of $500 to the head of a family would do very little good; but that exemption in Vermont, where everything is cheap, would in its practical operation be a very large exemption.

I admit that this question is not entirely free from doubt; but inasmuch as it is impossible ever to get a bankrupt law, if it is to disturb all these rights that have grown up in the various States under what may be called their police regulations, I propose to vote for the bill with this provision in it. In order to keep their poor from being a public charge, the States have said that the law should not take from their families a certain amount which should be reserved for the support of those families. The States, in the exercise of that very wholesome power, have passed exemption laws which have been very useful and beneficial and have been popular everywhere. I say that if we undertake to interfere with this entire system, which is ingrafted on the laws of almost every State of the Union, we shall never be able to have any bankrupt law. The question being one of some doubt, as I said in the outset, it is proper that we should pass the bill as it is, and then the courts will decide what is meant by "uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy." I believe they will hold this bill to be constitutional; and if so we can have a bankrupt law; if not we can have none. It seems to me that in this age every civilized commercial country should have a bankrupt system. It is a disgrace to us that we have no means of liberating men of enterprise who happen to have been unfortunate. Especially is such a law necessary after periods of revolution and civil war. If we can liberate such men from the burden of debts heretofore contracted we add to the prosperity of the community. It is highly important, as I believe, to have a bankrupt law, and inasmuch as we cannot get one without adhering to this clause in the House bill I am in favor of it and hope it will remain. I see no such cogent reasons of constitutional law as deter me from trying the experiment and seeing if we can adopt this wholesome legislation.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, February 2, 1867.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, communicating reports from the heads of the several Executive Departments of the Government, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of January 12 inquiring "whether any person appointed to an office required by law to be filled by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who was commissioned during the recess of the Senate previous to the assembling of the present Congress to fill a vacancy, has been continued in such office and permitted to discharge its functions, either by the granting of a new commission or otherwise, since the end of the session of the Senate on the 28th day of July last, without the submission of the name of such person to the Senate for its confirmation, and particularly whether the surveyor or naval officer of the port of Philadelphia has thus been continued in office without the consent of the Senate, and if any such officer has performed the duties of that office whether he has received any salary or compensation therefor;" which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore also laid before the Senate a report from the Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of January 30, the official reports, papers, and other data in relation to the causes and extent of the late massacre of United States troops at or near Fort Phil. Kearney by the Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SUMNER. I present the petition of George W. Hadden, who calls himself an unconditional Union man, of Norfolk, Virginia. He sets forth certain losses from the rebels of a bark and also of a steamer and his house, and says he can get no justice there, for the civil law in the South is nothing but rebel tyranny, and he asks for compensation for his losses. I move the reference of his petition to the Committee on Claims.

It was so referred.

Mr. SUMNER. I also offer the petition of colored soldiers, residents of Beaufort, South Carolina, praying for an extension of the time for the payment to the United States of the balance due for property bought at the sale held by the United States direct tax commissioner. As that subject was once before the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia I ask the reference of this petition to that committee.

It was so referred.

Mr. HOWARD presented the memorial of Charles N. Weiss, praying to be allowed a pension on account of the loss of his left arm at the battle of Gettysburg; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WILSON presented a petition of officers of the United States Army, praying for the passage of a law allowing officers of the Army to wear the full uniform on all occasions of the highest grade held by them by brevet or otherwise in the volunteer service during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented three petitions of officers of the United States Army, praying for an increase of pay; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. POMEROY presented a memorial of citizens of Kansas, remonstrating against the passage of any law authorizing the curtailment of the national currency, or a return within a limited time to specie payments; and against compelling national banks to redeem their notes in New York, or prohibiting them from paying or receiving interest on bank balances; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. POMEROY. I also present a memorial from Mrs. Benjamin F. Wade, and several other ladies, who are officers and managers of the National Association for the Relief of Destitute Colored Women and Children in this District, reciting the manner in which they came in possession of some property in the District of Columbia, and also reciting the manner in which they were dispossessed, and praying for such action as may secure them from loss in a law suit instituted against them by Richard S. Coxe, and protection in carrying out the objects of the association. I ask that this memorial may be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and I should like to have it printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reference will be ordered, and the motion to print will go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. POMEROY. The members of the Committee on Printing are all absent at present. There is not a member of the committee in the Senate, and I should like to have the motion to print acted upon unless it is unavoidable that it should be referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule requires it.

Mr. MORGAN presented a petition of the Adams Express Company, praying for the issue to that company of Treasury notes in place of the notes lost by it by the sinking of the steamer Bio Rio, March 22, 1863; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MORGAN. I also present the petition of all the sugar refineries in New York, in which they represent that there is invested in the United States some thirty-five million dollars of capital in the sugar refining business, and that it employs about nine thousand men. They state that the existing laws make a discrimination against their manufacture, equivalent to three fourths of a cent a pound. They also state that there is a discrimination in favor of Louisiana sugar which works greatly to the refiners' disadvantage. They therefore ask that the tariff bill now under consideration may be so amended as to relieve the refiners from this discrimination, and submit a detailed list of rates of duties to which, in their opinion, they are entitled. I ask that this petition may be referred to the Committee on Finance.

It was so referred.

Mr. YATES presented a memorial of citizens of Illinois, remonstrating against the enactment of any law that will curtail the present circulation of legal-tender notes; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. YATES. I also present the petition of John Mathers, of Illinois, praying, first, for the repeal of the act of Congress authorizing a reduction of the currency; second, the repeal of the act creating national banks; third, the redemption of bonds bearing interest with legal-tender notes, and the prohibition of the Secretary of the Treasury from issuing additional bonds; fourth, to prohibit the Secretary from converting bonds bearing interest in currency to bonds bearing interest in gold; fifth, to make greenbacks a legal-tender in paying interest upon, and redemption of, all bonds; sixth, to cause the Secretary of the Treasury to distribute gold used in the redemption of currency or bonds equitably; seventh, to give the people a safe, uniform, and permanent national currency. I move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL presented the petition of E. B. Litchfield, president of the St. Paul and Pacific Railroad Company, praying for a grant of the same number of acres of land per mile to that company as was granted to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, and the same sum in money or bonds as was granted to the Union Pacific Railroad Company for that portion of the line of said road lying east of the Rocky mountains; which was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. TRUMBULL presented a petition of R. J. Oglesby, Governor of Illinois, and others, praying for the restoration of S. Livingstone Breese, lieutenant commander in the United States Navy, to the active list; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 532) for the relief of the inhabitants of cities and towns on the public lands, reported it with amendments.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of N. Callan, Samuel E. Douglass, and William Laird, praying for compensation for services rendered in the selection of jurors in the District of Columbia, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 222) prohibiting payments by any officer of the Government to any person not known to have been opposed to the rebellion and in favor of its suppression, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am also directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 452) to prevent the illegal appointment of officers of the United States, to report it back with a recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed, the Senate having acted on the subject of the removal of officers in the bill which has already passed the Senate.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. R. No. 604) to define and punish certain crimes therein named, reported it with an amendment.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. HARRIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 562) to amend an act entitled "An act for the removal of causes in certain cases from the State courts," approved July 27, 1866; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

NAVIGATION OF WILLAMETTE RIVER.

Mr. NESMITH submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation of $40,000 for the purpose of removing obstructions to navigation in the Willamette river, in Oregon, and to report by bill or otherwise.

INTER-OCEANIC SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. CONNESS. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be requested to report to the Senate what steps have been taken by him to obtain from the Republic of Colombia the right for the United States to make necessary surveys for an inter-oceanic ship-canal through the territory of that republic.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish briefly to say, in this connection, that it will be remembered that Congress, at its last session, made an appropriation of $40,000 for a survey of the Isthmus of Darien, for the purpose of a ship-canal; and my information is that the State Department has not prosecuted its part of the business with the diligence that the importance of the question demands, and the object of this resolution is to ascertain officially from the head of that Department what has been done before any further steps shall be taken. I hope the resolution will be agreed to.

The resolution was adopted.

IRON-CLAD STEAMER ONONDAGA.

Mr. MORRILL. I offer the following resolution for reference:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and is hereby, authorized to transfer the iron-clad steamer Onondaga to the builder, George W. Quintard, upon his refunding to the Government the amount received by him for its construction.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest that the resolution in this form would not be the foundation of action. It would require a joint resolution in order to authorize the Secretary to make the transfer.

Mr. MORRILL. Well, sir, it is simply intended as a matter of reference for inquiry, and perhaps it answers the same purpose in its present form.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs if there be no objection.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS IN IDAHO.

Mr. WADE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 490.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask the Senate to take up for consideration the resolution which I offered the other day with reference to Mr. Motley, and which was objected to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the Senator from Ohio will yield to me for a moment to let that resolution be taken up. It belongs strictly to the morning hour, and there are reasons why that information should be had at once.

Mr. WADE. I insist on my motion. I want to have this bill disposed of.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 490) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Idaho," approved March 3, 1863. It provides that the judges of the supreme court of the Territory, or a majority of them, shall, when assembled at the seat of government of the Territory, define the judicial districts of the Territory, and assign the judges who may be appointed for the Territory to the several districts; and shall also fix and appoint the times and places for holding court in the several counties or sub-divisions in each of the judicial districts, and alter the times and places of holding the courts as to them shall seem proper and convenient.

Mr. WADE. I move to amend the bill by inserting the following as additional sections, to come in after the first section:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the next session of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Idaho shall be held commencing on the first Monday in December in 1868, and thereafter the Legislative Assembly of said Territory shall be held biennially, and the next election for members of the Legislative Assembly of said Territory shall be held on the second Monday in August, 1868, and thereafter said election shall be held biennially.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the members of the House of Representatives of said Legislative Assembly shall be elected for the term of two years, and the members of the council of said Legislative Assembly shall be elected for the term of four years: Provided, That at the first election hereafter one half of the members of said council shall be elected for the term of two years, and the remaining half for the term of four years; and the districts wherein the members of the council are to be elected for the term of four years at the next election shall be determined by proclamation of the Governor of said Territory: Provided, That in all counties and election districts which shall be entitled to elect two members of the council one of said members shall be elected for two years, and the other for four years.

Mr. NESMITH. From the imperfect hearing that I had of the reading of the bill, it struck me as an innovation upon the usual practice in the Territories. I believe it has heretofore been the rule in all the Territories that the times for holding the district courts should be fixed by the Legislature, and that the districts should be fixed by the Legislature.

Mr. WADE. This bill has nothing to do with that. There is another bill that will come up by and by that will regulate that.

Mr. HENDRICKS. What is this bill?

Mr. WADE. It is a bill in relation to the judicial districts in Idaho.

Mr. NESMITH. Does your amendment strike out the original bill?

Mr. WADE. No, sir.

Mr. NESMITH. I should like to hear the bill read again.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. NESMITH. I suggest that that seems to be an innovation on what has heretofore been the established rule in the Territories. The power to fix the times of holding the courts, it seems to me, properly belongs to the Legislature, and should be exercised by the Legislature where it is now lodged. If there is any reason for this change, I am not aware of it, and I should like to hear it stated.

Mr. WADE. I understand that there is a reason for it. There is great difficulty in fixing these districts in Idaho. There seems to be some controversy between the Legislature and the judges there. As I am informed, and believe from the statements I have received, the Legislature is disposed to fix the districts in such a way that they will be scarcely available at all. In these great Territories it is very easy for the Legislature to make the districts in such a form that it is almost impracticable to hold courts there, and becomes exceedingly inconvenient for the judges. Although this legislation may be new in the Territories it is not new in some of the States. Nobody knows better than the judges how to arrange the districts so as to be convenient for themselves and beneficial to the people. I think they would be more apt to know about that than the Legislature. Then, when they among themselves agree as to the districts or circuits, each one is to take his own. Our State has pursued that course to the satisfaction of everybody, and of the judges, too. I think the power is quite as well lodged in the judges as it would be in the Legislative Assembly, and as the judges seem to desire that it be so fixed I can see no objection to it.

Mr. NESMITH. The rule on this subject heretofore has been to allow the territorial Legislature to regulate this matter, and in our State, which was for a long time a Territory, we had some experience about it, and we thought the power was more safely lodged in the hands of the Legislature from time to time to determine where the courts should be holden than it would be if it were left in the hands of the judges. In either case I suppose it may be properly exercised and well exercised. I do not undertake to say what the facts about this case are; but when we remember that these judges are Federal officers, sent out there from the States for the purpose of discharging official duties, it seems to me the Legislature of the Territory are the best qualified to determine their districts and when and where it will best suit the convenience of the people to have the courts held. These judges are entirely independent of the Legislature, and if this bill passes they may fix the terms of the courts in such a manner as to relieve them entirely from the discharge of their duties, or almost so. They may fix the terms of the courts so far apart as to result in very great inconvenience to the suitors, and be a practical denial of justice. All the reasons are in favor of their making such an allotment if the thing is left in the hands of the judges. If it is left in the hands of the Legislature, where it always has been, it seems to me the Representatives of the people will fix the times and places and circuits so as to accommodate the people better than they would be fixed if the power was left in the hands of the judges. There would be every reason to induce the judges, if the power were left to them, to make such an organization of the districts and to fix such times for the holding of the courts as would be most convenient to themselves and enable them to perform as little duty as possible. I know it has been the uniform custom in all the Territories for the Legislature to establish the terms and districts, and I do not see any reason why this change should be made.

There is another consideration. Most of the judges to these Territories are appointed from States on this side of the mountains, from the old States, and they are not conversant with the topography or geography of the country or the wants of the people; and it seems to me if we make this change we shall place the exercise of this power in the hands of men who are not as well qualified to exercise it properly as those who now have it. I do not know of any particular reason in this case for a deviation from the general and well-established rule under which all the Territories have acted so far. If there be any reason I should like to hear it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think my colleague is quite mistaken in supposing that this proposed legislation is any innovation. Several years ago, before the organization of Idaho Territory, there was a law passed by Congress providing that in all the Territories the judges should fix the times and places for holding the district courts in the Territories; and while I was upon the bench in the Territory of Oregon, for a considerable portion of the time, the times and places for holding the courts in that Territory were fixed by the judges when they assembled to hold the supreme court of the Territory. The reason that that law does not apply to Idaho Territory is because the Territory has been organized since the enactment of that law, and the organic law specially provides that the Legislative Assembly of the Territory shall have that power; and if I am not mistaken, at the last session of Congress a similar law was passed in reference to Washington Territory. I know that a law was passed making the sessions of the Legislative Assembly in Washington Territory biennial, and the power to fix the times and places for holding the district courts in the Territory was conferred upon the judges.

Mr. NESMITH. I know a law was passed requiring biennial sessions, but I did not think the power to which my colleague refers was embraced in that law.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will say that representations are made to me and to the Committee on Territories by citizens of Idaho that the Legislative Assembly of the Territory, on account of their political hostility to the judges, are making laws and organizing the districts so as to subject the judges to the greatest possible inconvenience and the greatest possible expense, with a view, as is represented to me by reliable men, of compelling the judges to vacate their offices; and this sort of legislation is not peculiar to Idaho Territory; but this bill relates simply to that Territory.

The bench in that Territory is made up of citizens of the Territory, with one exception; and the chief justice, who was formerly a member of Congress, has been there for a long time. They understand the wants and necessities of the Territory as well as anybody in the Territory. They can arrange these courts so as to be able to attend them, so as to suit the convenience of themselves and of suitors better than the Legislative Assembly of the Territory. I have heard no objection made to this legislation. I do not understand that the Delegate from the Territory, notwithstanding he differs in politics from the judges of the Territory, objects to this kind of legislation. At any rate, no such objection has been made known to me, and I believe it is the wish of the citizens of the Territory, so far as I am advised, that this bill should pass.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I should like to hear the amendment read.

The Secretary read the amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. This is rather singular legislation to take one Territory and provide as this bill proposes. I should like to know a little more about it, especially in view of the statement of the Senator from Oregon, that it is owing to a political controversy between the Legislature and the judges. It is very certain that the Legislature could have no interest to do a wrong in the districting of the judicial circuits. It is attributing a very singular spirit to a legislative body, that merely for the purpose of making an inconvenience to the judges they would make an improper districting of the Territory for judicial purposes. Now, I cannot believe that. I have no doubt that the Senator from Oregon has very full information satisfactory to himself, but I think probably that comes from the judges, indirectly, in some way or other. The judges have an interest, of course, in making their circuits easy. The people who are represented in the Legislature have an interest in having the courts held. It is certain that there is a great complaint in the Territories against the Federal officers, because they are absent so much from the Territories, and that is an evil that ought to be corrected; but I think in passing a bill like this we are not going in the direction of correction. To let the judges fix the districts to suit themselves, instead of allowing it to be done by the Legislature, is certainly not to the interest of the people as much as it is to the convenience of the judges, and therefore I will not vote for it.

Mr. WADE. These additional sections are offered because we have been besought by the people of almost every Territory, for some years past, to provide for biennial instead of annual elections. They do not believe it to be necessary to assemble their Legislature every year. A good many of the public men of this Territory have been here, and they all say it will be a saving of expense and more convenient to them to have biennial sessions; and we thought, on the whole, we would try it, at their request. It will be an improvement, and as the people seem to want it, so far as the committee were informed on the subject, we thought it would be well to try it, and I think myself it would be an improvement. I do not believe there is any necessity, generally, for their meeting every year. They are scattered over this large Territory, and it is very inconvenient and quite expensive for the Legislative Assembly to meet. I am inclined to think they will get along just as well with biennial sessions, and therefore I was willing they should try it. This amendment is adapted to secure that end, and that is all there is about that.

As regards the bill itself, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. WILLIAMS] has stated the facts that appeared to the committee to require this change: that there was a controversy between the judges and the Legislative Assembly, and it seemed to us best to grant this power to the judges. I have no apprehension that the judges, any more than the Legislative Assembly, would so arrange the districts as not to be for the best advantage of all concerned. They certainly know as much about it, and I have no doubt would do it as honestly and fairly. I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Before the Senator takes his seat, I will suggest to him that some days since he introduced a resolution, which was slightly modified, and he accepted the modification, calling upon the Department for information as to the time the territorial officers have spent in the Territories. Now, I propose that he let this bill lie over until we get that information. I should like to know how far the judges themselves are interested in this question, and that report of the Department will perhaps give us a little information. It may appear that these are among the judges who have not been in the Territories very much; and I suggest to the Senator to let the bill lie over until we get that report.

Mr. WADE. I will inform the Senator that that resolution does not go any further than the Governors of Territories, if I recollect aright.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Oh, yes, it does.

Mr. WADE. I think not.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator made an inquiry as to a particular officer, and I proposed as an amendment to include all Federal officers of all the Territories. We shall get that information in a few days, and then we can see a little more about it. I think this is singular legislation, and therefore I would rather it should be postponed until we get that information.

Mr. WADE. I would not be adverse to that were it not that the session is drawing to a close and this is a Senate bill, and unless we get it through very soon there will not be any opportunity for it to pass, and I think, for the convenience of the people in this Territory, the bill ought to pass.

Mr. NESMITH. I do not object to the proposition contained in the amendment as to the biennial legislative sessions. I think that is proper. What I do object to, and what I think is improper, is the provision that these judges shall determine the amount of labor that they shall perform for their salaries, and fix the districts in which they shall perform that service, in contradistinction to the Legislature. I believe the Legislature are better qualified to do that.

Now, sir, there has been some hasty legislation on this subject. Only this week a bill passed here for the purpose of correcting the evil of the absence of Federal officers in the Territories from their posts. I must say, with all deference to the Senate, who passed that bill, that I believe they have infinitely increased the evils which were intended to be remedied. Heretofore officers could only be absent by permission of the President. If they were absent without that permission they forfeited their salaries during the time they were absent. The bill that we passed the other day is of the same character, I think, with the bill now pending. It provides that an officer may be absent from the Territory thirty days without any leave of absence, but he must not be absent more than thirty days at one time. Now, sir, there are three Territories very nearly contiguous to the State in which I reside, and many of the officers of those Territories are appointed from that State. Under the provisions of the bill which you passed the other day it would only require the Federal officers in the adjoining Territories to remain in their Territories twelve days in a year; that is, they could be absent thirty days, and then by returning one day be absent thirty more. Under the operation of that law I am satisfied that the people of the Territories will be deprived of the services of the Federal officers to a greater extent than heretofore. The evil will be very much increased by the passage of that bill. I think this bill is of the same character. It is calculated to relieve the Federal judges from discharging any duties in this Territory except such as they may determine in their own pleasure that they will discharge for the compensation which they receive from the Government. If it be satisfactory to the Senate, I should prefer that the bill would go over until it can be more thoroughly investigated.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not suppose it is necessary or proper at the present time to discuss a bill that has passed the Senate. I entirely disagree with the views expressed by my colleague. Everybody knows that the great mischief is that the office-holders in the Territories come to Washington and spend their time in Washington, and they do that with the leave of the President, which can always be obtained by an influential friend or a telegraphic dispatch. The object was to keep them in the Territories to which they were assigned in the faithful performance of their duties, and that will be the effect of the bill to which my colleague refers.

Now, as to this bill, so far as these judges are concerned, I know that they have been in the Territory and have been engaged faithfully in the performance of their duty. It is a mystery to the Senator from Indiana how a Legislative Assembly can incommode judges by legislation. Suppose a man who has a family lives in a certain city, has his home and his property there, and the Legislative Assembly provide that he shall hold court in a district two hundred miles distant from his place of residence. Suppose again that they make the districts two and three hundred miles long for the very purpose of compelling the judges to perform a great amount of traveling at very great expense, when the districts might be arranged in a compact form so as to accommodate the judges and to accommodate the suitors in the Territory. These judges have duties to perform under the organic act of the Territory. This bill simply provides that they shall determine as to the times and places where those courts shall be held, and there is no reason to suppose that these judges will fail to perform their whole duty, because if they do so they are guilty of a delinquency which will be ground for their removal. I am satisfied from representations made to me that this legislation is necessary and just. I do not desire to go into particulars. I do not desire to say anything here offensive to anybody more than is absolutely necessary; but I think I understand the system of proceedings in that Territory, and I believe that this legislation is just to good judges and necessary for their protection, to enable them to perform their duties and to meet the wants of the people of the Territory. If districts are made so that it is exceedingly difficult or impossible for the judges to go to the different counties, then the responsibility of not attending the courts is thrown upon them, and they are made responsible to the people for not performing their duties in accordance with impracticable and unjust legislation.

As to this being an innovation it is: altogether a mistake. I know it from experience while I was judge in Oregon Territory, as I have before stated. This law was in force there, and I never heard that anybody complained that the courts were not attended by the judges, and their duties performed satisfactorily to the people; and so in all the other Territories. The law applied at one time to every Territory in the United States, and it would have applied to these Territories, but they have been organized since that law took effect.

There is no occasion for delay about this matter. This is a bill that is offered in good faith, and I hope it will pass. It is intended to promote the interests of the people of Idaho Territory, not to promote the interests of any party.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move that the bill be postponed until to-morrow and that the amendment be printed. I do not want to delay it or to interfere with it, but I should like to know something more about it.

Mr. WADE. I hope not. We may as well pass it now as ever.

The motion to postpone was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; was read the third time, and passed.

SAN FRANCISCO AND PORTLAND MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. CONNESS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 157.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday, which is House bill No. 798, the bankrupt bill. Does the Senator move to postpone that?

Mr. CONNESS. I hope the honorable Senator who has that bill in charge will allow it to lie over informally. The consideration of this resolution, as will be seen in a moment, is of considerable importance, and it will occupy, I think, but a short time. If it should excite any considerable debate, of course I shall consent to its going over.

Mr. POLAND. With that understanding I shall not object to the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California asks that the order of the day be laid aside informally by unanimous consent, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution mentioned by him. It requires the unanimous consent of the Senate.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. No. 157) in relation to ocean mail service between San Francisco, in California, and Portland, in Oregon. It authorizes the Postmaster General to employ ocean mail service between San Francisco, in California, and Portland, in Oregon, not less than three times per month, in continuation of the service from New York, via Panama, to San Francisco; but the cost of the service is not to exceed $25,000 per annum.

The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads reported the joint resolution with an amendment to add the following:

And it is hereby made the duty of the Postmaster General, after the passage of this act, to advertise for bids for the performance of the service herein provided for, for at least thirty days in at least one newspaper published in San Francisco and one paper published at Portland, Oregon, and to contract therefor with the lowest responsible bidder.

Mr. CONNESS. Before the Senate vote upon the amendment, I ask the Secretary to read the report of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads accompanying the joint resolution. It is very brief and will state the case without any consumption of time.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads have had under consideration Senate joint resolution No. 157, providing for ocean mail facilities between San Francisco and Portland, in Oregon, and report:

That the only means of mail communication between California and Oregon at the present time is by overland from Sacramento to Portland, which requires in the winter season about twelve days to make the trip. It is over one of the worst mountain roads in the world. During the past year $5,000,000 of gold were received at San Francisco from Portland and the north, besides the large commerce in other articles of merchandise, and yet it takes twelve days to have communication between the citizens, parties to this great business.

There are three steamship lines now running between San Francisco and Portland, and they make the trip in three days. This resolution proposes for a small sum to establish an ocean service to meet this great want to commerce, and to establish it in continuation of the ocean mail service between New York and San Francisco.

The committee recommend the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. CONNESS. Now, Mr. President, I will simply say in addition that the amount proposed as the maximum to be paid for this service has been offered by the Department under former appropriations for similar service; but there was at that time but one steamship line engaged, and they would not perform the service for $25,000. There are at the present time three steamship lines, and the Government will undoubtedly get the service performed for that or a less sum.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is the amount in the bill?

Mr. CONNESS. The maximum amount is $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

MINISTER AT VIENNA.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope there will now be no objection to taking up and acting upon the resolution I introduced the other day. I do not wish to say anything about it, but I should like to have a vote upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires the unanimous consent of the Senate, another subject being before the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. What is the resolution?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read for information.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, if in his opinion not incompatible with the public interests, a copy of the letter on which the Secretary of State founded his recent inquiries addressed to Mr. Motley, minister of the United States at Vienna, with regard to his reported conversation and opinions, and to furnish the name of the writer of said letter.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon this resolution the Senator from Maryland is entitled to the floor, having been cut short by the expiration of the morning hour when it was last up.

Mr. JOHNSON. I had forgotten it, and am obliged to the Chair for reminding me of it. I did not rise for the purpose of objecting to the passage of the resolution, although I could wish for myself that the original resolution had not been passed, because then we should not have seen the letter which I read with very great regret, and which I think the country read with equal regret. If the President had refused to answer that resolution on the ground that it was injurious to the public interest, I think he would have been sustained by the public judgment hereafter. As to the particular letter which is called for, the resolution perhaps will establish a precedent that may be of mischievous application in the future. If the Senate shall claim the right to ask of the President the grounds upon which he appoints or upon which he removes officers, it would involve him in the duty of bringing before the Senate correspondence which was sent to him as confidential or sent to the Secretary of State as confidential. But under the particular circumstances of this case, as we have the correspondence between the Secretary of State and Mr. Motley, I do not object to the passage of this resolution.

If I had been told by anybody that Mr. Motley was so regardless of his duty as to be making the declarations he is stated to have made upon some unknown authority, I should have said at once that it was a base calumny. I do not mean the charge that he differed with the President of the United States in his opinion as to the policy which ought to be adopted in effecting the restoration of the southern States, but as to the effect that he had spoken in such disrespectful terms of the President or of the Secretary of State, and, above all, that he should have expressed an opinion so hostile to a democratic form of government and in favor of a monarchical one. No one who has read his History of the Dutch Republic—and no one I think has failed to read it who commenced to read it—would hesitate for a moment in coming to the conclusion that if there be a man in the country who is more absolutely convinced than any other of the policy and necessity to human liberty of such institutions as we live under it would be Mr. Motley.

Mr. SUMNER. I promised not to debate the resolution. I simply ask for a vote.

The resolution was adopted.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS—THE TARIFF.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I find myself called to account and denounced in a leading newspaper of Philadelphia for having "dodged" the vote upon an important public measure; and in this denunciation my colleague is coupled or united with me. I allude to the final vote on the passage of the tariff bill. That bill was put to a vote yesterday morning at half past twelve o'clock. It was the second protracted night session which had been held upon the bill, both of which sessions I sat out at some personal inconvenience. I stated at the taking of the final vote that I withheld my vote because I had paired off with a member of the Senate who was called away from the Chamber to attend the deathbed of a distinguished former citizen of Pennsylvania. I could not resist that appeal, and therefore agreed to withhold my vote upon the passage of the bill.

As to my colleague, I believe he was not present; but it was manifest, it was known to every member of the Senate that the polling of any particular vote on that measure would have no influence upon the result; it was not important.

As for myself, sir, passing by all the personal denunciation with which I am visited in the paper referred to, I desire to say that I have never "dodged" a vote on a public question in a legislative body, either in Congress or in the Legislature of my own State. When I find it necessary to avoid any responsibility imposed upon me by my position as a member of this body I shall give the public a due announcement of the fact. They need not seek to learn it through the columns of a sensation newspaper press.

Mr. DIXON. I desire to state with regard to the vote upon the tariff bill, in which my name does not appear, that if I had been present I should have voted for the bill. I was in favor of the bill; but the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] was kind enough to pair off with me in consequence of my being unable to be here through indisposition.

THE BANKRUPT BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (H. R. No. 598) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] to the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, which will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment to the amendment, which was to strike out on page

27, section fourteen, after the word "States," in line twenty-seven, the following:

And such other property not included in the foregoing exceptions as is exempted from levy and sale upon execution by the laws of the State in which the bankrupt has his domicile at the time of the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, to an amount not exceeding that allowed by such State exemption laws in force in the year 1864.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

And a homestead or other property not exceeding in value $2,000.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, since the discussion last night I have given this matter a limited examination, and I am thoroughly satisfied from the history of the clause in the Constitution on this subject, as disclosed by the debates, that it was intended to secure a uniform distribution of the assets of the bankrupt; that that is all that was intended by a uniform system of bankruptcy. The evil complained of, and which was intended to be remedied by the constitutional provision, was an unfair distribution of the assets of the bankrupt; that one State would provide that the assets should go first in order, giving priority to the residents of that State and excluding non-residents from fair participation. The difficulty consisted in the distribution of the assets of the bankrupt, and that, it seems to me, is what they intended to have uniform laws upon, and not in regard to what the assets of the bankrupt were.

I think that the assets of the bankrupt must depend upon the laws of the State under which he holds his assets. If, in order to have a uniform law on the subject of bankruptcy, it is necessary to exercise a power which will in effect make the laws for the collection of debts uniform, then the right of a State to pass laws for the collection of debts is substantially taken away under this clause; but nobody had ever anticipated that a State might not make exemptions; might not make its various regulations for the collection of debts; and those regulations, take them as a body, interfere with the assets to be distributed on all occasions. For instance, one State gives a judgment-creditor a lien upon the property, and that becomes a vested right in one State; in another State not. That is one of the laws for the collection of debts. Now, you say it is not uniform because the State law steps in and gives a lien to some individual in the State; gives him a preference; and consequently it does not operate uniformly.

There are a thousand instances of want of uniformity that will exist and which Congress must remedy if you mean by uniform laws to reach the property of every debtor to the same extent and distribute it; but if you simply mean that whatever assets he has subject to execution under the law of the State where he lives shall be equally distributed between the creditors residing in that State and those residing out of it for the convenience of commerce, leaving the State to make its own laws for the collection of debt, then the two systems are in harmony. If you carry this idea of uniformity clear out it goes too far; and by the same course of reasoning it would deny the States the power to pass any laws for the collection of debt which may not be permitted under the power of Congress to pass bankrupt laws to make a uniform system. Consequently I am clear that the law as it now stands is within the power of Congress, and it is certain we cannot practically have a bankrupt law unless we exercise this power in subordination to the power exercised by the States for the collection of debt. We must allow the State exemption laws, which have grown up during the last seventy-five years and become established, to remain. Rights exist under them. The people understand and appreciate and are attached to them. We had better not exercise the power of Congress in this matter if we are to interfere with all these domestic arrangements of the States. I do not believe that was anticipated. I believe the meaning of the Constitution was that there should be a fair and equal distribution to persons living anywhere within the United States of the bankrupt's assets, whatever was liable to execution under the local law. In that view both systems are consistent, and can be harmonized and operate together. The theory of absolute uniformity requires you in effect to abrogate the power of the States to pass laws regulating executions, which could not have been contemplated.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I am earnestly in favor of a bankrupt law. I am in favor of this bill. I have examined it with considerable attention, and I regard it as the most complete and perfect system of bankruptcy I have ever seen. I would be glad to vote for this provision if I could consistently with my own convictions do so, because I am persuaded that if this provision can be retained in the law the bill is more likely to pass; but I am convinced that this provision is in violation of the Constitution.

Congress is authorized by the Constitution to pass a bankrupt law; but it is restricted in its authority to do so: it must be a uniform law. What is meant by that? It is a law that shall operate equally, impartially, uniformly throughout the United States. This provision cannot operate in that way. There are incorporated into this law all the State laws in relation to the exemption of property from sale or execution for thirty-six States with all their diversities. Those laws are made a part of this bankrupt system. More than that, sir: it operates unequally and partially in the States themselves. Take my own State. In the State of New York a man may have exempted from sale on execution a homestead of the value of $1,000. Here are two bankrupts applying at the same time for a discharge; one of them has secured his homestead worth $1,000; the other has a homestead worth $1,000, but he has not taken the necessary steps to exempt it from sale or execution. One of them saves his homestead; the other is obliged to surrender it. Suppose these men owe debts only to the amount of $1,000 each; one of them is discharged from his debts and saves property enough to pay all his debts, while the other is obliged to give up property enough to pay his debts. There is no uniformity in the operation of it at all. The very first object of a system of bankruptcy is to secure the appropriation of the property of the debtor to the payment of his debts, and it is in reference to this that the term "uniform" is used in the Constitution; it is in reference to nothing else. It is uniformity in the appropriation of a man's property; and now here is secured by this provision as it stands in the bill the greatest possible diversity, diversity according to the legislation of thirty-six different States, and then diversity in the operations of the laws of those States themselves. I cannot suppose that this provision will ever stand the test of judicial examination.

Mr. FOSTER, (Mr. EDMUNDS in the chair.) Mr. President, with the Senator from New York I am honestly and earnestly in favor of a bankrupt law, and I agree with him that this, with a few alterations, is one of the best of all bankrupt laws that I have ever read; and I agree with him further, in regard to this provision, that I cannot vote for it. I believe it is as clear and palpable a violation of the Constitution as is possible, and I would ask Senators this question to test it: Suppose the bill had, for each of the thirty-six States of the Union, assigned to those who might apply for the benefit of the law a different amount of property to be exempt from its operation. Beginning with the State of Maine, suppose it were to say that all persons applying under the voluntary clause for the benefit of this act, or all who under the involuntary clause should be made bankrupts, might have property to the amount of $200 to be appropriated for the support of the bankrupt; that in New Hampshire they might have $300; in Vermont, $400; in Massachusetts, a homestead of the value of $1,000; in Connecticut, a homestead of the value of $500; and so on, through all the thirty-six different States, giving to bankrupts in some States a small amount, to some in other States none at all, to some in others an unlimited amount—would such a law be constitutional? Suppose these precise differences were in the text of the bill, and we were asked, under the Constitution of the United States which authorizes us to pass uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy, to vote for it, could we do it? Is there any Senator on this floor who would say we could do it?

The idea of the Senator from Nevada is that this term "a uniform law" means merely a uniform distribution of the assets of the bankrupt. What are the assets of the bankrupt? They are different in the different States according to the laws of the different States, and that, as I understand the honorable Senator from Nevada, satisfies the provision in the Constitution that the law is to be uniform. You are to make uniform distribution of the assets of the bankrupt, and in some States he would have no assets at all, while in another State a man situated just as he was might have $100,000 of assets. Is that law uniform? In some of the States, I repeat, the law now is that a man may hold property to an unlimited amount and still under the State law have the benefit of a discharge from his debts. The situation of that man prior to his taking the benefit of this act would be that of a bankrupt; that is to say, he would owe more debts than he had property to pay, he might own a homestead exempt from all liability, unlimited in value, it might be worth $100,000; he might owe $100,000, so that he would in fact be a bankrupt; but applying under this bill for its benefits he would get discharged from his debts and this law would make him then actually worth $100,000, whereas before the act he was not worth one cent. Is that law uniform? Is it just? Is it honest?

If we cannot in the act itself make discriminations as to the amount of property in one State and in another which a man may hold, because of the constitutional requirement of a uniform law, it seems to me perfectly clear that we cannot authorize the States to make these discriminations and differences. We cannot allow that to be done indirectly which we cannot ourselves do directly. The principle is plain and positive.

Senators seem quite unwilling that Congress should interfere very much with State laws in regard to debtor and creditor, and are very jealous of any intermeddling with State exemption laws. At certain times it is very popular on this floor to talk about, I will not say the omnipotence of Congress, but the absolute power of Congress and perfect weakness of the States. States rights, under certain circumstances, are sneered at exceedingly in certain quarters, and the man who talks about States rights is in danger, I have thought at times, of being regarded as in sympathy with traitors. But now if the Congress of the United States undertake to say that a man who is in debt shall pay his debts or rather that his property, except a certain amount, shall be applied to pay them, if they claim to judge how much shall be left to him they are exceeding their legitimate powers and trampling on State sovereignties. I claim to be a tolerably good States rights man and a tolerably good friend to a national, consolidated government. Both these governments are recognized in our system, and each is entitled to control in its appropriate sphere. I see no difficulty in allowing the law of Congress to be uniform throughout the States on this subject of bankruptcy, and to set aside State laws which may interfere in any way with such uniformity. I see in this no exertion of power on the part of Congress which is not plainly given to them by the Constitution. The insolvent laws of all the States have always been considered abrogated, or at all events their operation suspended during the existence of a national bankrupt law.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. Suppose the State of Connecticut passes a law allowing a judgment to become a lien on all the real property of the debtor, and a judgment is obtained against the man before he commits an act of bankruptcy. It becomes a lien on real property. Let us suppose, then, that in Massachusetts there is no law allowing a lien on his real property, would Congress have the power under its authority to pass uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy, to remove that lien in Connecticut so as to place the debtor there in the same situation as the debtor in Massachusetts? Or would the State have the right to take away this property from the operation of your law, and give it to a third person through the instrumentality of a judgment lien? I submit the question, would Congress have power to prevent the property from being encumbered by judgment liens prior to the act of bankruptcy?

Mr. FOSTER. I have no doubt that Congress would have power to pass an act which should relieve the property from a lien of that sort under a State law. I am not aware that there has been a doubt expressed by any judicial tribunal upon that subject. Under former bankruptcy laws the question arose, not as to the power of Congress to do it, but as to whether by the act they had done it. That question has been considered and different decisions have been made upon it by different tribunals under the bankrupt law of 1841.

Mr. STEWART. Allow me to ask a question. Suppose Congress did not make any provision on the subject, but left the States to provide for a lien, would not that be as strong an argument against the uniformity of the law as it would be if the reservation was made in favor of the party himself? Is there any practical difference in principle between making the reservation of the property of the debtor in favor of a third person to the exclusion of the mass of the creditors, and making it in favor of the family of the debtor? If the reservation in the former case does not destroy the uniformity of the law, surely it does not in the latter.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. President, I have no difficulty in answering the question of the honorable Senator. If Congress passes an act which relieves property from liens created under State laws—

Mr. STEWART. That of course is prior to final judgment.

Mr. FOSTER. If the bankrupt law of the United States did not annul those liens, to my mind it would not be clear that it was not a uniform law on the subject of bankruptcy, because of course those liens, in order to take effect, must be pursued to final judgment; the creditor must get his judgment against the debtor, and show the amount of his debt, and apply the property under the law to the payment of that debt. In that case the property of the debtor goes to pay his honest debts. That is the effect of the law under those circumstances. The effect of this law, if it be carried out, is, that in some States all a man's property shall be taken to pay his debts, and in other States none of his property shall be taken to pay them; though in the case where none is taken he is a man having large property, and in other States where the bankrupt has but little property all goes. There is a wide difference, to my mind, between the manner in which property may be applied to the payment of debts and exempting the whole property of a bankrupt, no matter how large, from paying any debt whatever.

And, Mr. President, I am unable myself to conjure up quite so much sympathy as some gentlemen seem to feel as to the amount of property held by a man who is unable to pay his debts. I have been so unfortunate as to be in debt myself, and so unfortunate as to have people in debt to me; and I have known more cases where people owed debts who never paid, who were better off and had more property than some of their creditors, than I have of cases where debtors made themselves, or were made poor and destitute for the benefit of creditors. Within the circle of my observation there are poor creditors, made poor by their inability to collect their honest debts of men who may perhaps be owners of homesteads highly valuable in some States—eighty acres or more, without limitation as to value. Where would be the evil to the community if one of these debtors, if you please poor debtors, with his valuable homestead, should be compelled to part with it for the benefit of his poorer creditor, who unfortunately was without a homestead? The creditor, under such circumstances, and there are many such, is quite as deserving of our sympathy and the benefit of our legislation as the debtor.

This, however, is quite aside from the principle that is here involved. The question here is whether we have power under the Constitution to pass a law of this sort. The Committee on the Judiciary have had this matter under consideration, and they report to us that we cannot pass the bill with this clause in it without violating the Constitution of the country. In expressing the opinion that this clause must be stricken out or that this law will be unconstitutional, I am following the lead of the Committee on the Judiciary, who it may be presumed have examined this question with care, and whose opinion thus expressed is entitled to great respect.

Mr. POLAND. Mr. President, I had not intended to say anything more in reference to this question than I said yesterday and some two weeks ago, when this subject was up before. Notwithstanding the ingenious manner in which this subject has been presented by my friends, the Senator from New York and the Senator from Connecticut, I am still quite unconvinced that it is necessary to strike out this portion of the bill as it passed the House in order to make this a uniform bankrupt law. I confess that were it not for the very confident manner in which these gentlemen and other members of the Senate, whose opinions are entitled to very great respect, especially upon legal subjects, have declared their opinion that this adoption of the homestead exemption laws of the different States renders this law open to the objection that it is not uniform, I should have felt that the objection was entirely frivolous.

I think, if it were in our power, if it were possible for us to adopt the systems of the different States in relation to the exemptions in favor of poor debtors, every member of the Senate would say that as a matter of discretion, as a matter of judgment, as a matter of prudence, as a matter of safe and proper legislation it was better to leave that subject to be regulated by the State Legislatures, who know the circumstances, the wants, the condition of all their inhabitants, rich and poor, better than we can. All would agree that it had better be left to them to say what mercy should be shown to the poor debtor, how the balance should be struck between the creditor and the debtor in their respective localities, than we can determine here in this Senate Chamber.

This is not the objection; it is that under the Constitution we have not the power; that if we leave any exemptions at all in favor of the debtors who either voluntarily go into this system for the purpose of becoming relieved of their debts or are driven into it by their creditors, if anything is to be left to them that does not go into their assets for division among their creditors, if anything is to be doled out to them or retained to them out of their property, it must be by some uniform rule that must be written down in the law itself.

Mr. President, it seems to me that this is not necessary in order to make this a uniform system of bankruptcy. All the States have exemption laws, and they are different in their terms. Some exempt a greater amount of real estate than others; a greater amount of personal property is exempted in some States than in others; but all the States have laws on the subject. They have regulated it according to their own judgment. They say that a debtor may, for his own subsistence and for his family, retain a certain amount of property that shall not be liable to be taken by any legal process for payment of his debts. No question is raised here, none ever has been raised, but that those State laws are entirely constitutional. It has been decided over and over again that the States may make additional exemptions of property as against debts that were already in existence in the time. So no question arises but what the State laws, providing that certain property may be retained by debtors against their creditors, are valid and constitutional and binding.

Now, what does this bill propose to do, as the House passed it? We propose simply to get up a law and adapt legal machinery to it, by which all the property of every bankrupt throughout the United States that is liable for the payment of his debts may be taken and administered and distributed equally among the creditors. This is all this amounts to. If there were no exemptions by State laws and we were to make an exemption; if by existing laws all the property of every debtor throughout the country was liable for the payment of his debts and we were to undertake to establish a system of administration throughout the entire country, I should agree I think that we must make an exemption that should be uniform in all the States; but that is not what we attempt to do. By this bill we lay hold of, we seize all the property of every bankrupt that is liable for the payment of his debts by law, against which the creditors have any right to proceed by any process in the State courts, or in the United States courts; and we say that all that property shall be taken and be distributed in a particular way equally among all the creditors.

Is not that uniform? In order to comply with this requirement of the Constitution, to have the system of bankruptcy uniform, is it necessary that it must operate in every State precisely alike? Are there not a great variety of contracts that are binding and legal and valid and hold a man's property in one State that would be entirely invalid and inoperative to hold his property in another State?

But it may be said that this proves nothing, because a contract valid by the laws of the State where made must be valid everywhere. But under the bankrupt law of 1841 the question arose in relation to statute liens. I mentioned the other day the controversy that arose in New England, beginning between Judge Story and Judge Parker, who was then chief justice of New Hampshire, in relation to our New England attachment liens; I believe they are not known, out of New England, in any part of the United States as an ordinary process. With us in New England when a man brings an action for the collection of a debt, if he can find property of the debtor, he sends out the sheriff and seizes it upon the writ in advance of any judgment, without filing any affidavit that the party is going to abscond or has property concealed. It is a matter of right with him. The bankrupt law of 1841 provided that liens upon property should be saved from the operation of the bankrupt law. The question arose whether these statute liens in New England came within the meaning of the bankrupt law, and it was eventually settled that they did; they were sustained.

It was utterly impossible that any such lien could exist in any State out of New England under any State law; there were no such liens on property elsewhere. If the bankrupt law of 1841 protected those liens upon property in New England, it established a rule for New England that was different from that established in any other State, and saved a kind of claims upon property which in any other State could not exist; and these were not like contracts that were entered into in one State which would be good everywhere, because these could have no force or effect out of the State, could not be enforced in any other place. And yet the Supreme Court of the United States held that the recognition of the State liens by that bankrupt law did not render it liable to the objection of want of uniformity in the constitutional sense.

I do not desire to enter into any extended discussion. Enough has been said by other Senators in relation to this question, so that it is understood in all its bearings; and it seems to me that it is entirely clear that the adoption of these different homestead exemptions of the different States does not prevent the law from being uniform in a legal sense. I might say that when the bankrupt law of 1841 was under discussion in Congress an amendment was adopted in the House by a very considerable majority embodying the very provision that is contained in this bill, and that amendment was moved by a member of Congress who is now one of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States. Eventually that amendment was struck out by a small majority, but it was at one time adopted, and adopted upon the motion of a gentleman who is now one of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. On this question of uniformity as to exemptions I wish to suggest that practically, if there is any want of uniformity here, the same want of uniformity exists now under the laws of the United States, because the Federal judges and Federal courts in every one of the States, in the collection of debts, recognize and enforce the existing exemption laws of the several States, so that in California the Federal courts allow an exemption of $5,000 worth of property as not liable to the payment of debts, while in the State of New York the Federal courts recognize $1,000 as the value of the homestead there not liable; and in all the States they recognize the various exemptions precisely as they exist under State laws. You might with just as much propriety say that those laws which our Federal judiciary are now enforcing in every State are unconstitutional, because they are not uniform in their operation, as to say that this bankrupt bill, when it shall have been enacted into a law, will not be uniform.

Mr. GRIMES. There is no requirement of uniformity in the case to which the Senator refers.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Every law of the United States must be uniform in every State. You cannot pass a law for one State that is not to apply to another.

Mr. GRIMES. Why not?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Because the laws which are to be passed must be uniform of necessity, and I say that so far as the uniformity of the laws of the United States is concerned to-day in the enforcement of the payment of debts the several exemptions of the States are recognized by the courts.

Mr. GRIMES. But not recognized under any uniform bankrupt law of the United States.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That is no answer to the point which I make. I say that the uniformity of the rule is this: to take in every State all the property that is liable to the payment of debts and distribute it. You take what is liable in California, you take what is liable in Iowa, you take what is liable in Pennsylvania, and distribute it by a uniform rule.

Mr. STEWART. It seems to me that the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Peck and others vs. Jenness and others, reported in 7 Howard, has an important bearing upon the principle here involved, and I am unable to distinguish between the cases. The learned Senator from Connecticut admits that if Congress passed a bankrupt law, whereby in one State the bankrupt's property could be taken under judgment liens and in another State not, it would have the same want of uniformity that this has.

Mr. FOSTER. I beg to correct the honorable Senator. I made no such admission. I did not admit that a law of Congress recognizing the existence of legal liens on property in the different States would have the same want of uniformity that the present clause in this bill has.

Mr. STEWART. Well, I will read the syllabus of the case in 7 Howard, to show that an analogous question has been before the Supreme Court of the United States, and has been decided:

"The proviso of the second section of the bankrupt act, passed on the 19th of August, 1841, preserves all liens which may be valid by the laws of the States respectively."

The States under this power to make liens might perhaps make liens in favor of the family as well as in favor of the creditors, which is the ordinary way.

"In some of the States, attachments are issued on mesne process by which the property seized is to await the result of the suit. This constitutes a lien which is saved by the proviso in the bankrupt act."

Some States allowed liens in favor of the bankrupt's judgment creditors; other States did not allow such liens: was that not a want of uniformity? And yet the bankrupt law of 1841 was held to be constitutional. Surely there was as great a want of uniformity under the lien laws as there can be under the exemption laws of the States. The principle is the same, so far as I can comprehend it.

"Therefore, where an attachment was issued, and the defendants afterward applied for the benefit of the bankrupt act, a plea of bankruptcy was not sufficient to prevent a judgment from being rendered condemning the property under attachment."

"The fourth section of the statute, if it stood alone, would make a plea of bankruptcy a good plea in bar in discharge of all debts; but if the whole statute be construed together this is not the result."

"A rejoinder, setting forth that the district court of the United States had decided that the attachment was not a valid lien upon the property, was not a good rejoinder."

"The district court could not oust the State court of its jurisdiction which had already attached."

The bankrupt law of 1841 in States where they had not this attachment law—and I believe it existed only in New England—reached all the property of the debtor. In New England when a debtor became in failing circumstances a creditor would issue an attachment and require a lien, and in the distribution of the assets would get his whole debt if the assets were sufficient to meet it; but that practice was not allowed out of New England. Yet the Supreme Court did not hold that the law was unconstitutional for that reason. That was a greater and more unfair inequality than will be created by allowing the States to provide within their respective limits for a small pittance to be reserved, either in the shape of a homestead or an exemption of property from execution, for the benefit of the family.

Mr. FOSTER. I am quite unable to see the analogy which the honorable Senator from Nevada undertakes to trace between a lien created by a creditor attaching property prior to final judgment and an exemption law of a State giving a man a homestead of unlimited value free from all claims of creditors. In the case of an attachment, the lien may become perfect by pursuing the claim to final judgment, taking out execution, and levying it upon the property. The amount of the lien is then ascertained, and it can be discharged by applying the property to the payment of the debt if the property be sufficient. But the case the honorable Senator puts is that of an exemption of a creditor's property as against all debts. Where is the analogy? Is there any lien in that case which is to be perfected by showing the amount which may rest on the property? None whatever—the amount can neither be ascertained nor discharged.

The Senator talks about creating a lien for the benefit of the family. Suppose it were provided that property of the debtor, a homestead of unlimited amount, should be exempt from sale, attachment, or execution at the suit of creditors, for the benefit of the family; what then? Would that aid the matter? Could the family show the amount of their lien on the property? Is there any mode of ascertaining what the value of that lien is and discharging it, and then having the residue of the property applied to the payment of honest debts? Not at all. Nor is it necessary that what the Senator calls a lien should be for anybody's benefit but that of the debtor himself. He may have no family, no wife, no children, and still if a State passes a law that every individual may hold a house and land of unlimited value exempt from attachment or execution in favor of his creditors, the lien must be equally effective where there are no wife and children, as where there are both. But it is no lien at all. What we mean by lien is a legal claim on property held for the satisfaction of a debt, which can be ascertained, and when ascertained, may be paid, and the property so held as security for the debt is then relieved. There is nothing of that sort in this case. There is no analogy whatever—not the remotest. This is no lien in any sense in which the law recognizes the term "lien." It is an abuse of terms to call it so.

Mr. STEWART. It appears to me that the reason why the Senator from Connecticut fails to perceive the analogy, is that he fails to see the exact objection to this bill. The objection, as I understand it, is want of uniformity; and it is said that it must be uniform in distributing all the property of the debtor, that if it distributes all the property of the debtor in one State it must in another. We, on the contrary, say that what is meant by uniformity is the distribution of what property the debtor has which is liable to execution at the time of the act of bankruptcy. Our opponents say that it means the distribution of all his property. What difference does it make, so far as regards the principle of uniformity, whether the property is taken under the State law and given to his family, or taken under the State law and given to his creditors? It is not in either event distributed under this bankrupt law. You say that if it is not distributed under the bankrupt law the law is not a uniform law. We show you instances where property was not distributed under the bankrupt law, but taken by attaching creditors who happened to get in first in some States where they have that process; and of course that proceeding was not allowed in other States, and the Supreme Court recognized the right of the attaching creditors in a few States that had this summary process to acquire a lien and take the bankrupt's property, and thus to prevent its distribution among the creditors generally. A State enables its citizens to do that by its laws, and the Supreme Court held the congressional act which permitted this to be done to be a constitutional bankrupt law. This bill provides that whatever is subject to execution under the State laws shall be distributed among the creditors. If in order to make a uniform bankrupt law you must distribute all the property that the debtor has, you must abrogate the State laws that allow liens to be acquired. Then we say that the former law was unconstitutional; because all the property was not distributed in some States, while it was in others—it operated differently in one State from another.

The objection to this bill is that it operates differently in one State from what it does in another, because the amount of homestead exemption in one State is larger than in another. The former bill operated differently in the different States; because Vermont had an attachment law which enabled her citizens when they saw a debtor in failing circumstances to acquire liens upon his property, and other States had no such law, and consequently when the bankrupt's property came to be distributed in Vermont the State laws regulated the distribution to a certain extent. Now we say we will allow these State laws to operate in favor of the homestead exemption for the family of the bankrupt. It is quite as equitable and as fair to allow it for that purpose as to allow it in favor of the first grabbing creditor, if I may be permitted to use the expression. Is it a greater exercise of power to let a State law come in and take some of the property for the support of the family of the bankrupt than it is to let the State law come in and take a portion of it for the benefit of the attaching creditor? The equity is as high in the one case as in the other, and there is as much uniformity in the one case as in the other.

The objection to this bill is the want of uniformity. The act of 1841 had a greater want of uniformity in reserving the liens of attaching creditors and allowing them an advantage. I think the law of 1841 gave an undue advantage to attaching creditors by preserving their liens. I think that was bad policy. I do not think it was equitable and fair. When a man goes into bankruptcy his property should be distributed among all the creditors. But that is not the point; the policy of the law permitted an exercise of power on the part of the States to prevent an equal distribution of the assets, if you mean by assets all that the bankrupt may possibly have. If you mean by a uniform bankrupt law one which shall operate alike on all the property subject to execution in the various States, that the same acts of fraud shall constitute a cause for forcing a man into bankruptcy in one State as in another, that the practice shall be the same in all the courts, and that when the assets are distributed the citizens of one State shall share in them like the citizens of any other State, here you have such a bill, and you run in conflict with no State laws. But if you say that there shall be no State law which takes or appropriates for any purpose any portion of the debtor's property that does not exist in all the States, then you run in conflict with the legislation of the States, with the reserved rights of the States, and with their entire judicial system.

If you give the Constitution a rational construction, if you say it did not mean to take away from the States the power to exempt from execution a portion of a debtor's property in order that it might be used for the support of his family, that it did not intend to take from them the power of keeping the poor debtor and his family from the poor-house, that it did not intend to prevent the States from enacting attachment laws giving the preference to the most active; but did intend that when a man went into bankruptcy his assets should be fairly distributed among the creditors, citizens of all the States alike, did intend that the practice should be the same in all the courts of the United States, did intend that the same acts of bankruptcy should be sufficient to force a man into bankruptcy—if that is what is meant, you have here a law of uniform operation upon the people of the United States. It takes hold of and distributes all property that is not exempt from execution, all that is subject to be taken by creditors. But if, to be uniform, your law must disturb and overturn the settled systems of the States, no bankrupt law can be passed; and if this provision cannot be retained I am opposed to ever passing a bankrupt law, for I believe homestead exemption laws and laws exempting from execution the necessities of life to a sufficient amount to support a family for a limited time are essential to the peace of society and to prevent suffering and distress. The States have exercised their power in this respect in a wise, economical, and judicious manner. If these most essential regulations of the States are to be set aside and overturned by a bankrupt law, I say let us have no bankrupt law. But I do not believe the Constitution requires any such thing. I do not believe any such stretch of power was intended to be conferred upon Congress. I have no doubt that if this bill be passed in the shape it now is, it will be easily harmonized by the courts with the systems of the different States, and the real spirit and intent of the Constitution in requiring the law to be uniform will have been carried out.

Mr. FOSTER. It may be owing to my dullness, Mr. President, but I do not see the exact similarity which the gentleman says there is between recognizing a lien created by the law of a State and an entire exemption of the property of a debtor from being taken by his creditors for the payment of his debts.

Mr. STEWART. I beg pardon; there is no case of that kind existing; there is no State where there is an entire exemption.

Mr. FOSTER. While the gentleman is insisting upon the rights of the States, he will not forget that it is perfectly competent for a State to make a law declaring that there shall be no legal process at all in the courts of that State to compel payment of a debt hereafter to be contracted. The States beyond a doubt may make laws which shall entirely prevent the suing of parties for debt, and leave every man to make a contract on his own risk, trusting to the honor of his debtor to pay him or not. Now, suppose any State has such a law at the present time, and we judicially, senatorially, have no means of knowing but that some States now exempt all the property of debtors from legal process for the payment of debts. In effect it is done where it is provided that household furniture and the homestead comprising a certain number of acres of land shall be exempt from all liability. This is the law in some States, and where that law exists the Senator claims that it is a perfectly valid law which we must not disturb. If that is all the property that the man has got, and it may be worth $100,000, by the law of the State all that man's property is exempt from legal process to compel payment of a debt. The gentleman insists that that is the law. I insist that the State has a right to make the law that there shall be no legal process to compel the payment of a debt. If that were the case we should have this singular spectacle, according to the gentleman's doctrine: that a bankrupt law would be uniform when in some States debts could be collected by law and in others they could not be collected by law; because the gentleman says the question is simply, what are the assets of a bankrupt within this State. If by law he has no assets that can be applied for the payment of his debts, under the law there is nothing to distribute in that State.

I was saying, Mr. President, that the Senator from Nevada was making the claim, in effect, that a man might be worth an independent fortune in one State and his property be protected from all legal process for the payment of debts, and another man worth but a pittance in another State would be compelled to part with a portion of that pittance to pay his debts under the same law, and that a uniform law. I confess I am unable to see any uniformity in such a law. I do see a want of uniformity between a law which in one State leaves a man independently rich and exonerates him from all debt, and takes all but a given amount in another State for the payment of his debts. There is no uniformity in that that I can see.

The gentleman can see no want of similarity between the law of lien in some States created by an attachment which he calls a grab law and this present proposed law. The difference, Mr. President, may be shortly stated thus: that what he calls the grab law is a mode by law of appropriating a man's property for the payment of his debts; the other is an appropriation of his own property to himself for his own benefit, putting his creditors at defiance. The one is all for the debtor's benefit; he holds it for himself, no matter how much, and his creditors may whistle for their claim; the other compels him to give up his property, except such an amount as the law holds to be necessary for his subsistence, for the benefit of his creditors. There is a difference, to me, in these two cases. Why, sir, this very bill, on page 17, beginning at the twenty-seventh line, has this clause:

And such other property not included in the foregoing exceptions as is exempted from levy and sale upon execution by the laws of the State in which the bankrupt has his domicile at the time of the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, to an amount not exceeding that allowed by such State exemption laws in force in the year 1864.

Several States have altered their laws since 1864 on this subject, and of course the law in those States would not be uniform in its application; so that within the same State there would be a lack of uniformity under this bill, as well as all over the United States. There would be no uniformity in any two States out of the thirty-six, and in many instances there would be a lack of uniformity within the same State; and yet the gentleman says the bill is uniform, because it distributes the assets of the bankrupt alike, when in the one case he has assets to an immense amount which cannot be touched, and in the other all can be touched down to a very small amount. The very gist of the whole matter is, what are the assets? The whole case turns on that, what are the assets? There may be millions in one case and no assets over $200 in the other, and that is uniformity!

Mr. STEWART. The Senator from Connecticut has failed to show by his argument that the creditors of a bankrupt in the State of New York, where there is no attachment law, fare the same as the first attaching creditor does in the State of Vermont, where they have an attachment law. I take those States for illustrations. I undertook to show that if uniformity meant to disregard everything and go directly to the property of the debtor and equally distribute it we never could have uniformity, and there was not uniformity under the other law; and I instanced the case of liens. Suppose A owes $10,000 in Vermont. He has creditors in the city of New York to the amount of $5,000. He has a creditor in Vermont to whom he owes $10,000. Suppose that he has $6,000 or $8,000 worth of property. He becomes in failing circumstances, and this Vermont creditor attaches and takes it all. He goes into bankruptcy. Was that property equally distributed; or did the creditor in Vermont, who, by virtue of his lien law, went in and took the whole property and prevented any distribution with the other creditors, have an advantage?

Mr. FOSTER. If the Senator will allow me, suppose he paid that, an honest debt, the day before he commenced operations in bankruptcy, would that be an equal distribution among all his creditors? Suppose he paid a debt, an honest debt, and he honestly paid it?

Mr. STEWART. That would be a different proposition.

Mr. FOSTER. Why?

Mr. STEWART. We are discussing now the power of a State to interfere to enable a party to get those assets. If the State has power to interfere and let a creditor in Vermont take the entire assets by preferring a prior lien, that State has the same power to protect the family in the homestead. It is as high, but no higher exercise of constitutional power. I say it is begging the question to say that any of these laws exempt all the property of the debtor. There has been no law cited that is to that effect. The laws on this subject are entirely similar. It is true, owing to the particular situation of the country, it costing more to live and property being higher in one State than another, one State may exempt a little more than another; but there is no great hardship in it, no practical difficulty; and there is not one half the inequality that there was under the old law, that allowed one creditor to come in and take the whole under a prior attachment; but the Supreme Court and Congress in 1841 recognized that power in the State.

Now, I submit if a State can prefer creditors in this form by allowing them to acquire prior liens and thus prevent an equal distribution of the property, can they not, to a limited extent, as they have already done in some of the States, protect the family from starvation? To say that there are unlimited reservations in any State is saying what the record will not warrant. I know of no such law; none has been produced. Beside, we are adopting in this bill the State exemption laws of 1864, and it is to be presumed that they have been examined, and it has been ascertained that there is no great inequality or unfairness in those laws. It has not been shown. The presumption is that each of those laws is suited to the particular condition of the State by which it was enacted, and that the practical working of this bill will be uniform, as near as may be, by recognizing the State laws. It will be more uniform in its operation by the adoption of those laws than it would be by making an arbitrary amount to operate all over the United States. But I do object to the assumption of the right, under this power, to distribute the assets of the debtor, to legislate with regard to the collection of debts in all the States, and to abrogate their laws.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Nevada, in his first remarks this morning, stated one of the true principles of a bankrupt law, and that is, that there must be an equality in the distribution of the property or assets of the bankrupt.

Mr. STEWART. The distribution of those assets which are subject to execution by the State laws.

Mr. DAVIS. That is not the meaning of the Constitution. The meaning and the plain words of the Constitution are, that every property right, every dollar of assets that the bankrupt owns must be distributed, and must be distributed equally, because the requisition of the Constitution is expressly that the bankrupt law shall be uniform; that is, the system of bankruptcy established by the act of Congress shall be equal. The honorable Senator from Nevada conceded the whole argument this morning when he said that the equality contemplated was the equal distribution of the assets of the bankrupt. I concede that that is the principal element of equality which is contemplated by the Constitution.

Now, sir, what is that principle? If I can get the attention of the honorable Senator from Nevada I think I will make a discrimination which will prove the fallacy of his position. His position is that because the bankrupt act of 1841 recognized the validity of certain liens, and the Supreme Court in its decision sustained the validity of that provision of the bankrupt law of 1841 which recognized the validity of those liens, therefore the provision which is moved to be stricken out of this bill does not establish an inequality in the distribution of the assets of the bankrupt. Why, sir, a man has an estate in every subject of property that he owns. If the law creates a lien upon that general property, this lien is a particular property, not belonging to the bankrupt or the owner of the property generally, but belonging to other persons, who are entitled to the lien. Can anything be plainer than that? A man wishes to become a bankrupt under this law if it passes; he owns in the State of Wisconsin, if you please, a landed property of a thousand acres of land. He has not paid, though, half of the purchase money to his vendor for this land, and that vendor has a lien by the laws of Wisconsin upon that land for the payment of the residue of the purchase money. The act of 1841 simply recognized the validity of such liens, and the Supreme Court decided that the clause recognizing the validity of such laws was not unconstitutional.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Will the honorable Senator from Kentucky allow me to ask him a question on that point, speaking of the laws of Wisconsin?

Mr. DAVIS. It was a mere example used by me by way of illustration.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I propose to put a question bearing on the precise point as applicable to Wisconsin. By the law of Wisconsin the homestead, which is exempted from payment of debts of the debtor, cannot be mortgaged or sold unless the wife join in the mortgage or in the sale. Now, the question I put is this: by your bankrupt law passed by Congress can you take away from the wife her right in that property?

Mr. DAVIS. If the Senator will permit me to proceed I will soon come at the principle that I am contending for. The principle that I contend for is that every property right which is denominated in the laws of bankruptcy by the term "assets" that a bankrupt owns—

Mr. STEWART. At what time?

Mr. DAVIS. When he becomes a bankrupt.

Mr. STEWART. When he commits an act of bankruptcy?

Mr. DAVIS. Just let me proceed in my own way, if you please. The distinction is that all of a man's property who seeks to become a bankrupt is thereby made subject to distribution among his creditors according to the rule established by the bankrupt law; and the bankrupt law, to be constitutional, that establishes that rule of distribution in our country must be uniform; that is, it must make a uniform distribution of the property of the bankrupt.

I conclude, then, that every property right which a bankrupt has is a part of his assets, and to make a bankrupt law constitutional under our Constitution the law must distribute equally all of his assets or all of his property rights in every State in the Union.

The honorable Senator from Nevada argues persistently and with much ability to prove that liens created by the owner of property, and imposed upon his property by him or by the law, are not subject to be distributed among his creditors. That I fully concede. Why? Because there is a special property in those liens that does not belong to the debtor, but belongs to other individuals, and therefore cannot be distributed as part of the property of the bankrupt. Can anything be plainer than that? Here is the clause in this law which is objected to, and which gentlemen contend if it is continued in the law will vitiate it, because it will be establishing an unequal bankrupt law, and in that position I concur:

And such other property not included in the foregoing exceptions as is exempted from levy and sale upon execution by the laws of the State in which the bankrupt has his domicile at the time of the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, to an amount not exceeding that allowed by such State exemption laws in force in the year 1864.

Now, Mr. President, let us take an example of the exemption laws of two of the States. In New Hampshire, I believe, the exemption of property that is not subject to execution by the laws of that State amounts to $500 in the aggregate; in California to $5,000. Suppose this clause was written out fully, and it was said that wherever a bankrupt is declared in the State of New Hampshire all of his property, except the worth of $500, shall be distributed among his creditors; but in the State of California, when a debtor becomes bankrupt, there shall be $5,000 of his property reserved and excepted from distribution among his creditors. That is the principle that gentlemen are contending for, as I understand it.

Between these States of California and New Hampshire there is every variety of amount of exemption of property from execution by the laws of the States. If these various exemptions in every State are incorporated, as they are in effect by this provision that I have just read in this bankrupt bill before the Senate, it simply amounts to this: that the law, instead of being uniform in relation to the distribution of the property or assets of a bankrupt, shall be and is hereby enacted to be as various, as multiform, as unequal as the laws of the different States in relation to the exemption of property from execution.

Suppose that this clause had proceeded in extenso to incorporate the exemptions of property from execution in every solitary State in the Union, and had declared that these exemptions of property from execution should be held and taken as a part of this bankrupt law: I ask the honorable Senator from Nevada would such a law as that be a law making equal distribution of the assets of a bankrupt among his creditors? No, sir; it would be as various as the laws of the thirty-six States; it would be as unequal, as these different States in their respective modes would have established a different amount of property exempt from execution and from the payment of creditors.

Then, sir, it seems to me to be perfectly plain that a bankrupt law (and that is the one which we are now considering) which exempts in California $5,000 worth of property to the benefit of the bankrupt, or of his family if you choose, and a bankrupt law which exempts in the State of New Hampshire but $500 worth, is unequal, and comes within the denunciation of the Constitution, which declares that the system of bankruptcy established by Congress shall be uniform throughout the United States.

My honorable friend from Nevada conceded everything this morning in his argument, according to my judgment, when he admitted so strongly, in such few and plain words, that the equality required by the Constitution in bankrupt laws was equality of distribution of the estate among the bankrupt's creditors. A law which by general terms or by express provision would make a different rule of distribution of assets by reserving a different amount of estate of the bankrupt to be exempt from distribution among his creditors in all the States would be as flagrantly unequal and in violation of the Constitution as it would be possible to make anything.

Gentlemen may say that the amount is not large, but you concede a principle here that comprehends everything. As was stated by the honorable Senator who is the President of the Senate pro tempore, [Mr. FOSTER,] any State may repeal all laws by which debts are to be coerced within its boundaries. The subject of exemption of property from execution belongs to each State within its jurisdiction; they may make it of any amount they please; and this concedes a principle that would enable any State to exempt from distribution as a part of the assets of a bankrupt any amount of property in character and in value that the authorities of that State should choose to provide in their laws.

Now, sir, after the objection which I have stated, and which has been so much better stated before by other gentlemen who have participated in this debate, I think it is a perfectly plain proposition that the Constitution requires equality of distribution of the assets of the bankrupt; that all his property is a part of his assets, that so far as there are liens upon his property valid in law he is deprived of so much of his property and it does not belong to him, but it belongs to the parties who hold these liens. But so far as there are no liens held by third persons upon fair and valid considerations all his estate, the whole of his property, and the whole of his assets are subject to equal distribution among his creditors, whether he lives in California or in New Hampshire, and whether he seeks to be declared a bankrupt in the one or the other State, and that any law which provides for an unequal distribution of those assets belonging to the bankrupt comes within the inhibition of the Constitution.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President—

Mr. STEWART. With the consent of the Senator from Wisconsin I should like to make a single remark in reply to the Senator from Kentucky. The Senator from Kentucky did not quite understand my meaning, or I did not make myself sufficiently plain. I wish to state again that by the term "uniform" there must have been contemplated an equal distribution of the assets of the bankrupt; that is to say, such assets as he might not have exempt from execution at the time of the decree. If it meant other than that, if it meant an equal distribution of all the assets of the bankrupt at the time he committed the act of bankruptcy, which the discussion has assumed, then the law of 1841 was most clearly unconstitutional, because it allowed particular creditors to obtain advantages over others after the commission of an act of bankruptcy. This clause was put into the Constitution in view of the law of involuntary bankruptcy as it existed in England. Voluntary bankruptcy had not then been resorted to except, perhaps, in some of the States, but that was not a general system; and it was called insolvency and not bankruptcy originally in the States.

The provision of the Constitution had reference particularly to involuntary bankruptcy where the party was forced into bankruptcy by his creditors, and the word "uniform" was used in that view. If it means that there shall be an equal distribution after the act of bankruptcy is committed, then the law of 1841 was unconstitutional, because it provided that after the act of bankruptcy, and before proceedings in bankruptcy were commenced, after the party became insolvent; after he had committed a fraud, the State might allow a favored creditor to come in and acquire a lien on his property, and thus prevent an equal distribution of it among the creditors; and it was held in the case which I have cited that all that was required was to distribute fairly among the creditors, reside where they might, what property was left subject to execution. That could be distributed among the creditors; and that was distributed. Thus the decision under that law practically said that after an act of bankruptcy was committed a creditor might secure an unequal distribution of the property under the authority of the State. If a State could do that, surely a State may reserve a lien for the benefit of the family.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I had intended to submit some remarks in reply to the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. DAVIS,] but the ground has been covered by other Senators, and therefore I shall forbear making any further remarks, for the purpose of allowing a vote to be taken on this question if the Senate are prepared to vote, without my detaining them further.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs upon the amendment of the committee, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I understand that the committee reported in favor of striking out the clause which preserves the State exemptions, and now the question is whether we will concur with the committee in striking out the clause.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on striking out the clause recommended by the Committee on the Judiciary, to be stricken out in the fourteenth section, on page 17.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 14, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cragin, Davis, Dixon, Fogg, Foster, Harris, Henderson, Lane, Saulsbury, Sprague, Sumner, Trumbull, Williams, and Wilson—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Cattell, Connors, Cowan, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Grimes, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Kirkwood, Morgan, Morrill, Norton, Patterson, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Stewart, Van Winkle, Wade, and Willey—25.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Creswell, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Guthrie, Hendricks, McDougall, Nesmith, Nye, Riddle, Sherman, and Yates—13.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOWARD. Now that we are upon this passage, I desire to move an amendment which is verbal rather than substantial.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest that there are other amendments reported by the committee not yet acted upon. The general practice is to go through with the amendments reported by the committee; but the Chair will entertain the amendment of the Senator from Michigan if he presses it.

Mr. POLAND. I shall not object to that course if the Senator from Michigan desires to move his amendment now.

Mr. HOWARD. I move to insert between the word "execution" and the word "by" the words "or other processes or order of any court;" so as to read:

Such other property not included in the foregoing exception as is exempted from levy on execution or other processes or order of any court.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary read the next amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, which was in section twenty-six, to strike out in lines forty-four, forty-five, and forty-six the words "on the application of any creditor or of the wife of the bankrupt, and on such reasonable notice shown as the court may direct, and for;" and in line forty-six after "shown" to insert "the wife of;" and in line forty-seven to strike out "bring his wife" and insert "attend;" so as to make the clause read:

For good cause shown, the wife of any bankrupt may be required to attend before the court, to the end that she may be examined as a witness.

The amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution of the Senate with amendments, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

A bill (S. No. 453) regulating the tenure of certain civil offices; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 96) providing for the payment of certain Kentucky militia forces.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

A bill (H. R. No. 1090) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to receive into the Treasury the residuary legacy of James Smithson, to authorize the Regents of the Smithsonian Institution to apply the income of the said legacy, and for other purposes; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 126) for the relief of certain settlers on the Sioux reservation in the State of Minnesota.

TENURE OF OFFICE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will take this occasion to lay before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives just received to the bill (S. No. 453) regulating the tenure of certain civil offices.

The Secretary read the first amendment, which was in section one, to strike out in lines three, four, and five the words "excepting the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, and of the Interior, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General."

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate disagree to these amendments, and request of the House of Representatives a conference on the disagreeing votes.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope we shall agree to the House amendment. I see no occasion for a committee of conference. I think there is no reason in the world why the members of the Cabinet should not be included in the provisions of this bill. I think that we may as well meet that question here now as in a committee of conference. I was not present when this bill was passed by the Senate; but it seems to me that all the reasons why we should regulate the appointment and removal of officers apply to the members of the Cabinet as well as all others. I see no propriety in the exception. I trust we shall take the vote in the Senate upon the proposition, and see if we cannot agree with the House; and if it be in order, I make the motion that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion supercedes the motion that the Senate disagree and request a conference. The question, therefore, is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois, that the Senate agree to the amendment made to this bill by the House of Representatives.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I believe that it is usual in this body and in most other deliberative bodies, where, after a full and fair debate, a large majority have decided upon the propriety of a particular act of legislation, and the other House disagrees to that and proposes to amend it, to insist upon the view of this body and to ask for a conference upon the question. Now, sir, upon this very question, after full and fair debate, after all the reasons of both sides had been, I think, pretty much exhausted, after my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. Howe] had stated with great ability and with still greater eloquence, if it were possible, the reasons why the heads of Departments ought not to be excepted from the provisions of this bill, and when the considerations that presented themselves upon the other side had been advanced, the Senate upon the yeas and nays, by a very large majority, decided to retain this exception. Under such circumstances I think it would be extraordinary, to say the least, for us, without any new reasons, because there can be none, (for, as I said, the debate so far as reasons go was exhausted upon the subject,) to suddenly retrace our steps without even conferring with the Representatives of the House as to the reasons which induced and controlled them in proposing to us this amendment. Therefore I hope we shall stand upon the ground which we have adopted and have a conference, and not concur in this amendment.

Mr. HOWE. For one, I hope we shall agree in the amendment of the House. I differ entirely with the Senator from Vermont in the statement he has made, that this question was fully argued when it was before the Senate. I hardly think any member of the Senate took any particular interest in getting the amendment made except myself. I was not prepared to argue it at any length, did not attempt to argue it at any length. I know other Senators, who were not then present, think the amendment ought to be made, and are prepared to give much more conclusive reasons for the faith that is in them than I did give at the time. But, above all, I have a profound conviction, I have a very strong feeling, that we ought not to pass this bill without making the amendment. I cannot for my life conceive, I could not on the occasion of that debate here, the reason which I should feel like presenting to the people of the United States for taking from the President the power to remove postmasters and collectors of customs and officers of that description, and leaving in his hands the power to remove the heads of Departments at his pleasure.

That the legislative department of the Government has not as complete control over the question of removing the heads of the Executive Departments as these other officers I do not think was disputed the other day or will be disputed now. It is a question of expediency, then, if our power is the same, whether we shall exercise this authority in reference to these officers; it is a question of expediency and not of power. Upon a question of expediency I do not think the Senate will insist upon its opinion against the deliberate opinion of the House of Representatives. We have every reason to believe that the conclusion of the House of Representatives was arrived at as deliberately as the opinion of the Senate. If the Senate will not recede from the position taken the other day upon a very casual debate, is there any reason for supposing that the House of Representatives will recede from the position which they have taken upon a debate much more full than that had in the Senate? I think not.

Beside that, I have no doubt my opinions are influenced a great deal by my feelings. My feeling is, as I said before, very strong that the Senate ought to recede, and that the House ought not to recede; and it is constitutional with me when I think a thing ought to be done to believe that it will be done. I hope the Senate will recede and agree with the House of Representatives.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I understand this bill to be based upon some principle, and I should like to know of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] what that principle is, except it be this: that when a person is put in an office for a fixed period he is to be permitted to hold that office during the period, unless there is cause for his removal.

Is that the principle of the bill? If it is not that, what is it? Why are we passing this bill except to correct what is supposed to be an evil by the turning of men out of office through caprice, or to accomplish political ends, or from improper considerations of some kind? If that is the principle of the bill, are you going to violate it and say that because an officer is a member of the Cabinet he may be removed without any cause whatever? What principle is there in that? Will there be any difficulty in the President getting the consent of the Senate at any time to remove a Cabinet officer if there is any reason why he should be removed? Will any person fit to occupy the position of a Cabinet minister be likely to hold the place when his relations are unfriendly and hostile to the President? I apprehend not; and if he were disposed to hold it is there a Senator here that would hesitate a moment to confirm the nomination of the President for a member of his Cabinet to succeed such an officer when we understood that the relations between them were unpleasant, unless some public considerations were involved. Would there be any difficulty in the practical application of this bill? And do we not give up all the principle there is in it if we make this exception? We go to the country and say we have passed a bill upon principle, that public policy requires that the officers of the Government should be independent and not to hold their office simply at the will, the whim, and the caprice of the appointing power; and yet in that very bill we recognize the principle that a portion of them shall hold their offices at the will and the whim and the caprice of the appointing power.

I see no reason for excepting Cabinet officers, and I think there will be no difficulty in the practicable operation of the bill. If these officers are of the character such men ought to be, it is hardly to be presumed they would continue to hold office against the wishes of the President, with whom they were required to have personal intercourse. I apprehend such a case would hardly ever arise; but if there was a case where the public interests, the safety of the country, or its peace depended upon retaining in office a faithful public officer who was a Cabinet minister when it was sought to use him for the purpose of the overthrow or the destruction of the Government, I say the Senate ought to stand here and not allow him to be removed. If there is any principle in the bill, that is the principle. If that principle is omitted, I do not know why we are passing the bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I should hope never to see the time in this country when any man would hold a Cabinet office when he knew that it was disagreeable to the President. But I do not intend to discuss the question now. It was not expected, I presume, by many Senators that this bill would come up this afternoon; a great many seats are vacant; and I move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until Monday and proceed with the bankrupt bill. I know several Senators supposed the bankrupt bill was going on in its details and that that would be the only business before the Senate this afternoon, and they are not here, and a vote ought not to be taken at this time. This is a question upon which all Senators feel some interest.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not see precisely the reason for a postponement. The Senate is now unusually full, particularly when we consider that it is Saturday afternoon. I doubt whether on Monday we shall have more here than we have now. Then, the principle in question is so very simple that it will not require time or debate. I suppose every Senator is ready to vote upon it now. Why, then, postpone it? Should we come to a vote, my conclusion is very easy; I shall vote for the amendment. It seems to me that it is required by the general principle of the bill. Without that amendment, the bill is imperfect. However, on this motion to postpone, I will not go into the merits of the question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am indifferent, personally, whether this matter be postponed until Monday or not, because, so far as I am concerned, the reasons which have influenced my action have already been stated, and I have no fresh ones to give. The argument on the other side has been gone into to the largest extent. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] entertained and instructed us the other day by at least two elaborate and skillful speeches on the subject. The Senator from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD,] I am quite sure, maintained the same side of the argument with his accustomed ability; and we were not lacking even in the assistance of the wisdom of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] upon this point. But, in spite of all that, the Senate, in a pretty full Senate, much fuller than now, by a very large majority, the number I do not recall—by a majority of 27 to 15 I am told by my friend from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON]—refused to strike out these words. This identical subject was under debate for two successive days. I do not mean all the time; but in one form or another it was under consideration as to the propriety of striking out this clause in connection with inserting some others.

I do not think that anything will be gained by the gentlemen, who are determined that this clause shall be stricken out, supposing they had a majority at this moment, by forcing it to a vote and concurring with the House, because I think it altogether probable that the striking out of these exceptions will be the utter and entire defeat of the whole measure. Gentlemen who are desirous of taking the responsibility of having no regulation of this matter, for the simple reason that they cannot regulate it to the extent they think it advisable, may have it in their power to defeat action altogether, and of course must be willing to take the responsibilities which flow from that.

The principle that is involved in this measure is not precisely that which my honorable friend from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] stated just now. He was not present the other day when this debate took place. The principle upon which this bill proceeds, its cardinal and all-embracing principle, is that the duration of an office, the tenure by which an officer shall hold it, is the subject of legal regulation. That is the whole of the essential principle of the bill. It being established that it is the subject of legal regulation by the law-making power of the country, then the question is, how far is it expedient to apply that principle to particular offices, and in what way is it expedient to apply that principle to particular offices? The bill then proceeds upon the idea that as to the chief executive advisers of the Chief Magistrate it is expedient that the law should confer upon the President, as it does now confer upon him, the power to dispense with the assistance of a particular individual in the recess if he chooses to do it. It proceeds in respect to other officers whose duties are merely mechanical and executive and are not confidential and advisory on the principle that as to them it is unfit that the public should lose the benefit of their services until the ultimate tribunal, the President and the Senate together, shall think proper. That is the principle of the bill.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to ask a question of my honorable friend from Vermont. He says that the law at present authorizes the President to dismiss from office certain officers during the recess. Does the honorable Senator refer to any statute of the United States conferring this authority from the President, or merely to the practice and usage of the Government as they have heretofore existed? I am not aware of any statute on that particular subject, but I may be ignorant.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not refer to the practice, because I am not such a latitudinarian as to believe that a practice in the face of a Constitution as clear as I think ours is on this point would make the law; but I refer to the statutes of the United States, the acts of Congress, every one of which in creating these Departments, or nearly every one, provides an authority in the President to remove the chief executive officer of the Department at his will and in this way—

Mr. HOWARD. During the recess?

Mr. EDMUNDS. And in this way, not by expressly declaring that the officer shall hold his office at the pleasure of the President, but by providing that when the President shall remove the officer another officer shall exercise the functions of the office and have charge of the archives of the Department. That, in my judgment, confers an authority upon the President to remove, not by express grant, but by clear and unanswerable implication. I ask my honorable friend from Michigan, as we are fond of putting questions, whether such a statute in such language would not by implication confer the power?

Mr. HOWARD. I should hardly give it that effect myself in construing the statute; but I should treat it rather in this way: I should treat it rather as a recognition of the practice and usage of the Government on that particular subject. I should not treat it as a legislative affirmation of the principle.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The misfortune about that is that it is arguing exactly as my friend from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] and my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW] did, because they contend that those early acts of Congress were a recognition of what the constitutional law was; but the difficulty about its being the recognition of a practice is, that when the act of 1789 was passed establishing a Department of Foreign Affairs and some of the other Departments, the Government having just gone into operation, there was no practice to recognize. They were initiating a policy or a construction as the case may be; and the dispute, therefore, has always been since, whether under the force of those laws which were then enacted a prescription, so to speak, was running in favor of a particular construction of the Constitution because it was recognized, or whether no prescription ran at all, because upon the other side it might be treated as a power conferred. That has been the question, and that is illustrated more largely I think than in any other way, if you attend to the course of debates in the First Congress of the United States when that act was passed.

A majority of the persons who spoke in the House of Representatives upon the subject contended that the President under the Constitution had no such authority of removal. Some of that majority contended that it was a subject of legal regulation. Others of that majority contended that it was a power which, under the Constitution, resided incommunicably in the President in conjunction with the Senate. On the other hand, a minority of the speakers contended that the President possessed it alone. When a vote came to be taken a majority voted in favor of retaining the clause expressed in these words: "to be removable at the pleasure of the President." Some of them evidently voted in favor of that upon the ground that it being a subject of legal regulation, it was expedient to confer the power upon the President. Others may have voted upon the ground that the President had the power alone. A day or two afterward it was claimed by the friends of the presidential construction that this language expressly conferred a power, and therefore did not amount to any declaration of what the Constitution ought to be or was. They reconsidered that vote, and substituted for it this language, that when this officer shall be removed by the President of the United States then a certain other personage should exercise its functions ad interim. Even upon that vote some of the most distinguished of the members of that Congress who contended that it was a subject of legal regulation voted for those words, and voted for them upon the ground that there was still by that language a power conferred, and a power which they thought it expedient to confer.

Therefore, it results, Mr. President, that this early language of the statutes, this early passage of this act and the debate upon it demonstrate nothing in the way of an acknowledgment of constitutional and exclusive presidential power; and we are compelled now in resorting to that language to take it as it stands and to give it that construction which a lawyer or a judge or a statesman ought to give to it under the circumstances. I contend that we ought to give to it the construction of conferring upon the President a power which by legal regulation might be conferred if the law-making power should think expedient to bestow it; and that has been followed; that is the history of legislation ever since. We have even gone so far only four or five years ago, in 1863, I think, in creating the national Currency Bureau, as to provide that the chief officer of that department should not be removed by the President without the advice and consent of the Senate, and no man made any special objection to it. There was then nothing political in it at all.

Therefore, Mr. President, to conclude, (for I am digressing from what is now the true point under consideration,) while the principle of this bill does proceed upon the idea that all this is a subject of legal regulation, the application of that principle proceeds upon the not unusual idea that there are certain classes of offices that ought to be held upon one tenure, and certain other classes of offices that ought to be held upon another tenure; and the reasons why these specific offices we are now speaking of ought to be held at the will of the President during the recess, and the reason why they ought not to be, were largely and fully and exhaustively gone into the other day, as it appears to me, when my friend from Wisconsin made a most able and exhaustive argument on the subject, when my friend from Michigan backed him with the power of his logic and his influence, and my friend from Massachusetts also. What, then, are we to gain by displacing the deliberate judgment of the Senate and undertaking now to accede to what appears to me to be the passionate will of the House of Representatives? We ought to consider, it appears to me, that in undertaking to do, we ought not to allow ourselves in the heat of the moment to over-do, and make that which is good in itself bad by carrying it too far.

The motion to postpone was not agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 9, noes 25.

DEATH OF HON. PHILIP JOHNSON.

Mr. McPHERSON, Clerk of the House of Representatives, appeared below the bar and delivered the following message:

Mr. President, I am directed by the House of Representatives to communicate to the Senate information of the death of Hon. PHILIP JOHNSON, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania, and the proceedings of the House thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions of the House of Representatives will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions adopted by the House of Representatives.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I have certain resolutions to present to the Senate for adoption consequent upon the information just received from the House of Representatives. Before submitting those resolutions, however, I must say a few words which I think appropriate to the occasion.

PHILIP JOHNSON, a Representative in the other House from the eleventh congressional district of Pennsylvania, is no more. The House of which he was a member has adopted appropriate resolutions to do honor to his memory and to express, so far as any expression by them can go, their sincere condolence with his wife and friends over the great bereavement which they have suffered. I embrace the opportunity to express some words suited to the occasion, and they will be words, not of warm or extravagant eulogy, but of sincere regard and of genuine respect for the character and memory of the deceased.

Mr. JOHNSON was born in Warren county, in the State of New Jersey, on the 17th of January, 1818. When quite young he removed with his father to Northampton county, Pennsylvania, where he has ever since resided. He was a student of and received his education at La Fayette college, located at Easton, in that county. Subsequently, like many, perhaps a majority of the members doing service in the Senate and House, he was a teacher of youth, and served for two years in that capacity. Afterward he was a student at law, and was, I think in 1848, admitted to practice in the several courts of Northampton county. In 1853 he was elected to the House of Representatives of the Legislature of my State, and was reelected in the year following, having thus two years of service in that body. In 1860, just before the commencement of our unexampled difficulties and sufferings in this country, he was elected from his congressional district to the national House of Representatives. He was again elected in 1862, and still again elected in 1864, though more than two elections to that branch of Congress is unusual in the practice of my State. I think that habit which the people of that State and many other States have fallen into is an exceedingly objectionable one. However, this is not the occasion to discuss it. Mr. JOHNSON was returned for a third time, the people of his district thus deviating in his favor from the ordinary political rule among the people of Pennsylvania in the election of members to the other House.

Almost at the end of his third term he has been struck down. He will no longer move among us to give his counsel or to utter those words of encouragement which are as necessary in public as in private life to the honest and faithful discharge of duty.

Mr. JOHNSON was my friend, and he exhibited that friendship on more occasions than one. It is therefore a duty in which regret and pleasure are mingled to stand forward and cast upon his bier an offering of some few, poor words.

The closing of a life career, especially of one which has been passed under public observation, is well calculated to arrest the attention and to subdue the passions of the human breast. We know that we are all destined, sooner or later, to pass through the dark valley and experience new conditions of existence in a future state; and naturally we feel concern and interest in the character and fate of the traveler who precedes us. Human sympathy is roused in contemplating his departure from among us to that bourn from whence none have returned to reveal to us the dread secrets of the future.

Such occasions as this alloy passion, because they render the contests of the time insignificant in our eyes. They are made to appear to us as the accidents of an imperfect life, utterly unworthy of comparison with those transcendent possibilities which lie hidden beyond the portals of death. What we can affect in this life we will be apt to think must appear of little moment in the eye of the Deity, under whose power are the gates of life and of death; who openeth and no man shutteth, and shutteth and no man openeth; in whose presence we are as the dust of the balance, and our proudest works as naught.

Come, ye proud and lofty ones of the earth, whose eyes are lifted up and before whom men make abject obeisance. Behold the end of life, to which you are destined in common with the humblest and weakest of men! Will you not perceive in the august presence of death that wealth is nothing and fame but empty sound, and that your ordinary cares and labors are but vanity and vexation of spirit.

But thanks be unto God, whose power and presence fill alike the earth and the heavens, that He hath established a moral government for the world, and that whatsoever is excellent and true and noble and just is pleasing in His sight and accordant to His will! and that even finite man, in his low estate, may in some measure glorify His government and His laws.

Our departed associate had earnestness of conviction and sincerity of soul. He did not ever bow basely to Mammon; he did not scorn or scoff the humble; he was not abject before the face of power; he was not subservient to the passions of others; nor did he shrink and cower before difficulties and opposition. While he was gentle and generous to the appeals of friendship, he was courageous and brave in the presence of danger.

But that feature of his character as a public man for which I bespeak particular commendation and praise was his fidelity. He was no changeling. During the last hours of his existence he had faith in and stood by that creed which had fired his zeal in boyhood by the banks of the Delaware. He did not make shipwreck of his faith; he did not abandon his honest convictions when solicited by temptation or assailed by disaster. He was firm and intrepid in defending what he esteemed to be the right, and in denouncing and opposing what he believed to be wrong; and his blows upon political opponents, whether of defense or of aggression, were both manly and effective. His warfare was honorable, while his sagacity adapted him to leadership and secured him within the limited field of his action frequent and signal triumphs.

He made no pretensions to high ability. He claimed no front rank among the men of his age. But the place which he chose to fill he filled completely and with honor, and his chief ambition to be considered a true man by his fellows was completely realized.

I have reason to believe that our deceased associate, in spite of the depressing influence of disease and of what he regarded as unfortunate and unpropitious occurrences in the political world about him, was not dispirited and unhopeful of the future of his country. He looked beyond the clouds to that light which, though it may be obscured, cannot be extinguished, and which will surely return after a time to adorn and beautify the earth. He knew that war gives way in time to peace and to the works of peace; that charity and good will, though they depart from a nation, will return to its councils and to the hearts of its people; that the wounds of conflict may be healed; lives sacrificed may be replaced; industries suspended may resume their activity; and that vice and passion and crime, sown broadcast from the wings of war, may be checked in growth and subdued by generous statesmanship and by Christian labor. He left us with his faith in the destiny of our country unsubdued and unbroken; and shall we not share in that hope and contribute somewhat to its fulfillment? Are there no duties upon the living to execute the designs and complete the works of the departed? At least let us be hopeful also, and confident in the future of our country. If evils afflict us, if difficulties beset us, if dangers threaten, if wickedness prevail, let us "bate no jot of heart or hope," but emulate that spirit, that indomitable courage, with which Milton, old and blind and poor, within hearing of a ribald court and surrounded by a degenerate people, sang the advent of truth, justice, and brotherhood among men.

Mr. President, I offer the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has received with deep sensibility the announcement of the death of Hon. PHILIP JOHNSON, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That the members of the Senate, as a mark of respect for the memory of the deceased, will go into mourning by wearing crape on the left arm for the residue of the session.

Resolved, That the members of the Senate will attend the funeral of Hon. PHILIP JOHNSON to-morrow, at the hour designated by the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That, as a further mark of respect for the memory of the deceased, the Senate do now adjourn.

The resolutions were adopted nemine contradicente; and the Senate adjourned.

Mr. COBB. I object.

Mr. LONGYEAR. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection till he hears a brief explanation of the bill.

Mr. COBB. Very well.

Mr. ROSS. I object.

Subsequently Mr. Ross said: Understanding that this bill provides for no additional grant of land I withdraw my objection.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask that the bill be read, reserving the right to object.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I propose that they shall be devoted to business.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I object if any votes are to be taken.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I give notice that on Monday I shall move a suspension of the rules for the purpose of making this motion.

INDIAN DIFFICULTIES.

Mr. SCHENCK. As chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs I have received two communications in relation to some very serious difficulties arising from the fact that the agents and traders are furnishing arms to the Indians, which General Sherman has been obliged to stop in a summary way. I ask that these communications may be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

During the vote,

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York, stated his colleague [Mr. WARD] was detained from the House by illness, and that if present he would vote in the affirmative.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] was authorized to offer an amendment to the second section, which was to be voted upon in case the House agreed to the amendment just adopted. In lines three and four of section two strike out the following:
And excepting those specially excepted in section one of this act.

So the bill was passed.

During the roll-call,

Mr. HUMPHREY stated that his colleague, Mr. TAYLOR, was paired with Mr. WARD.

Mr. NIBLACK stated that his colleague, Mr. KERR, was still detained from the House by indisposition.

The result having been announced as above recorded,

Mr. HALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TARIFF BILL.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the tariff bill and have it printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing, under the law:

Resolved, That two thousand copies of the tariff bill be printed for the use of the House.

HEIRS OF THOMAS W. HARVEY.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has now commenced and the House resumes the consideration of the bill pending at the expiration of the morning hour yesterday, being House bill No. 1060, extending certain letters-patent for benefit of heirs of Thomas W. Harvey, the pending question being on seconding the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. HALE. I demand the yeas and nays on the passage.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. ALLISON. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 74, nays 62, not voting 54; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Beaman, Bidwell, Bingham, Boutwell, Boyer, Broomall, Campbell, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cooper, Dawson, DeFrees, Delano, Deming, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Finck, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grinnell, Hale, Aaron Harding, Hawkins, Henderson, Holmes, Hooper, Edwin N. Hubbell, Humphrey, Hunter, Ingersoll, Julian, Kasson, Koontz, William Lawrence, Leftwich, Maynard, McKee, Moorhead, Morrill, Nicholson, Paine, Perham, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Price, Samuel J. Hubbell, Hulburd, Jenckes, Kelley, Kuykendall, Ladin, Le Blond, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McClurg, McCullough, Miller, Moulton, Myers, Niblack, Noel, O'Neill, Orth, Pomeroy, Alexander H. Rice, Rogers, Rousseau, Shanklin, Stilwell, Strouse, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thornton, Trimble, Trowbridge, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Andrew H. Ward, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Stephen F. Wilson, and Wright—62.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Benjamin, Blaine, Blow, Brandegee, Chanler, Cullom, Culver, Darling, Dawes, Denison, Eggleston, Farquhar, Harris, Hise, Asahel W. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, Jones, Kelso, Kerr, Ketcham, Latham, George V. Lawrence, Lynch, Marshall, Marston, McIndoe, McKuer, Mercur, Morris, Newell, Patterson, Radford, Raymond, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sitgreaves, Starr, Taber, Nelson Taylor, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Robert T. Van Horn, Hamilton Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Whaley, Windom, Winfield, and Woodbridge—54.

So the bill was laid on the table.

During the roll-call,

Mr. RITTER stated that his colleague, Mr. HISE, was absent from the House on account of indisposition.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was laid on the table, and to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. MYERS. I demand the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Then I withdraw the motion.

The SPEAKER proceeded with the call of committees.

Before any reports were made,

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, said: I rise to a privileged motion. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill in relation to the Harvey patents was laid on the table, and to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER resumed the call of committees for reports of a private nature.

Mr. ROLLINS. Is a bill regulating the pay of the employés of the House a private bill?

The SPEAKER. It is not. A bill regulating the pay of one employé would be a private bill, but one regulating the pay of all the employés would not be.

MRS. EMMA A. PORCH.

Mr. DELANO, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Mrs. Emma A. Porch; which was read a first and second time.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Mrs. Emma A. Porch — dollars for services rendered by her to the United States as a spy and agent of the United States in the State of Missouri.

Mr. DELANO. I move to fill the blank with "$500," and I ask that the bill be put upon its passage.

Mr. ROSS. The bill makes an appropriation, and I move that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

W. W. POTTER.

Mr. DELANO, by unanimous consent, also, from the Committee of Claims, reported a joint resolution to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to pay a certain draft of W. W. Potter, late acting military agent of the State of New York.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DELANO moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAYMENT OF KENTUCKY MILITIA.

Mr. DELANO, from the Committee of Claims, also reported back, with an amendment, Senate joint resolution No. 94, providing for the payment of certain Kentucky militia forces.

The joint resolution was read. It directs the Secretary of War to cause to be investigated the claims of the forces called out under the command of James S. Fish in May, 1862, and to pay the said forces at the same rates for actual service rendered while passing from their homes as was allowed by law at the time to other volunteer forces; the officers to be paid as of the grade to which the number of men, under the mustering regulations of the Army in force at that time, would have entitled officers.

The amendment of the committee was to add the following:

And no allowance shall be made for any troops which did not perform actual military service in full connection and cooperation with the authorities of the United States and subject to their order; and before recognizing the services of the claimants under this act the Secretary of War shall be satisfied that to insure the safety of Brigadier General Morgan's command there was a reasonable necessity that he should call out the said troops.

Mr. McKEE. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last clause, as follows:

And before recognizing the services of the claimants under this act the Secretary of War shall be satisfied that to insure the safety of Brigadier General Morgan's command there was a reasonable necessity that he should call out the said troops.

I make this motion for this reason: those troops were ordered out by the general then commanding at Cumberland Gap. If they are entitled to pay at all, they are entitled to it upon their services in pursuance of this order. Now, if this amendment reported from the committee shall be adopted without modification it will make it a matter of discretion with the Secretary of War to judge at this time of the necessity of that order of the general in command of the post at Cumberland Gap at that time. Now it is very probable that there was no pressing necessity for that order; but even if that be true, these troops which were ordered into the service had no discretion; it was not in their power to decide upon the necessity of the order. They were obliged to obey the order without question; they did obey that order; and if they are entitled to pay at all they are entitled to it for the services they rendered, whether the order was necessary or not.

Mr. DELANO. I have only a word to say. The joint resolution requires that the Secretary of War shall find that there was a reasonable necessity for the order calling out these troops. This subject received the full consideration of the Committee of Claims, and the amendment I have reported received the approbation of all the members but two, I believe. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question was upon the amendment of Mr. McKEE to the amendment reported from the Committee of Claims; and being taken, upon a division, there were—ayes 18, noes 40; no quorum voting.

Mr. McKEE. I will not insist upon a further vote, though I think the amendment I have offered should be adopted.

Mr. LE BLOND. I will call for tellers on the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. McKEE.] These troops performed this service under orders, and they should be paid whether the order was proper or not.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. DELANO and LE BLOND were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 62, noes 40.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was then agreed to.

The joint resolution, as amended, was then read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DELANO moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. THORNTON, from the Committee of Claims, reported adversely upon the following, which were laid on the table, namely:

The petition of Mrs. Susan Buchanan, praying that she be reimbursed for losses sustained in consequence of acts of the Federal Army;

The petition of Madison Newton, asking allowance of extraordinary medical expense and personal attention because of wounds of his son received in the service;

Memorial of Mrs. Rachel Holt, for damages;

Petition of Captain A. N. Wells, for claim against the United States; and Petition of Mrs. Susan B. Ager, for damages.

GEORGE M. AND NAHUM FAY.

Mr. THORNTON, from the Committee of Claims, reported back, with an amendment, a bill entitled "An act for the relief of George M. Fay and Nahum Fay."

The bill, which was read, proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Messrs. Fay, of Eureka, Humboldt county, California, $7,000 in full for the use of premises occupied by captured Indians from 1862 to 1865, for taking care of sick and infirm Indians, and for depredations sustained from the Indians.

The amendment of the committee was to strike out $7,000 and insert $3,000.

Mr. BIDWELL. I desire to make an inquiry of the committee with reference to this bill, which is one introduced by myself. These parties actually claimed damages to the amount of about $13,000. A thousand Indians were at one time stationed upon their premises, remaining there from 1862 to 1865. I would like to know why the committee have cut down the amount to $3,000.

Mr. THORNTON. There was no satisfactory proof that damages to the amount of more than $3,000 had been sustained by the claimants. The committee based this amount entirely upon the damage to the farm of the claimants, the destruction of their crops, fences, &c. For this the committee deemed it proper to make allowance at the rate of $1,000 per year.

Mr. Speaker, I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; which was upon the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. THORNTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

J. AND O. P. COBB AND COMPANY.

Mr. DELANO, from the Committee of Claims, reported back without amendment a joint resolution for the relief of J. & O. P. Cobb & Co., of Aurora, Indiana.

The joint resolution, which was read, proposes to direct the Treasurer of the United States to pay to Messrs. Cobb & Co., out of any money applicable to the payment of claims against the Quartermaster's Bureau, $7,890 13, in full compensation for hay taken and destroyed by order of General Boyle, on the Ohio river, in July, 1863.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DELANO moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GEORGE HENRY PREBLE.

Mr. DELANO. The Committee of Claims, to whom was referred Senate bill No. 176, entitled "An act for the relief of George Henry Preble," a commander in the Navy of the United States, have directed me to report it back, and move that it be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. BLAINE. I trust the gentleman from Ohio will not press that motion. Let the bill go on the Private Calendar.

Mr. DELANO. Very well. I withdraw the motion to postpone indefinitely, and move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

CHARLES TAYLOR.

Mr. SLOAN, from the Committee of Claims, submitted an adverse report on the petition of Charles Taylor, collector of customs for the district of Saluria, Texas, praying reimbursement of moneys paid by him to subordinates and not allowed him by the Treasury Department; which was laid on the table.

JOHN TRADER.

Mr. SLOAN also, from the Committee of Claims, submitted an adverse report on the petition of John Trader, praying compensation for the use of lots in Washington city by the quartermaster's department; which was laid on the table.

BENJAMIN DE FORD AND OTHERS.

Mr. SLOAN also, from the Committee of Claims, submitted an adverse report on the petition of Benjamin, Isaac, and Thomas De Ford, of Baltimore, Maryland; praying compensation for property used by the Army; which was laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled House bill No. 1090, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to receive into the Treasury the residuary legacy of James Smith, to authorize the regents of the Smithsonian Institution to apply the income of the said legacy, and for other purposes; when the Speaker signed the same.

VICTOR MYLENS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Victor Mylens, first lieutenant sixty-eight New York volunteers; which was read a first and second time.

The bill directs the Secretary of War and the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to recognize the military services of Victor Mylens, late of the sixty-eighth New York volunteers, as an officer of said regiment; and that he shall receive the pay and allowances of the rank of second lieutenant from the 17th of April to the 16th of May, 1863, and of the rank of first lieutenant thereafter to the 6th of June, 1865, deducting therefrom the amount received by him as a private soldier in said regiment for the same time.

The report was read.

Mr. COBB. I make the point of order that that bill should have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The point of order comes too late.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I demand the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 31, noes 12; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER. No quorum voting, the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask what objection is there to letting the gentleman from Wisconsin say a few words?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I have no objection to hearing him for an hour if we had that much of the morning hour remaining, but we have only twelve minutes left, as I understand. I withdraw the call for the previous question, and yield to him for five minutes.

Mr. COBB. This, sir, is a proposition to recognize the services of a foot soldier as an officer. It is entirely new legislation, and ought not to be enacted without full consideration. Now, shall we launch out upon this entirely new and untraveled ground? Bills heretofore introduced to pay soldiers as officers, who for one cause or another failed to receive their commissions and be mustered in, have uniformly been rejected. I have no doubt this is a worthy soldier, and that he ought to have been promoted. I know many bad soldiers who were promoted when good ones were neglected.

This man, it appears, was captured by the enemy. The Governor of his State issued a commission, which he did not receive in consequence of his captivity, and, as I understand, another was commissioned and served in his place, and received pay as such. If we are to commence with this case and to look over the vast army we had in the field to find all of the men who served worthily and who, before being discharged, had the misfortune to be cheated out of their promotion and the consequent emoluments, then we will start in an undertaking that will have no end. The expense to the Treasury no man can conjecture. I only ask the House to pause before launching out into this wide sea of claims.

If I have any time left I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has two minutes.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. The rule which prevails at the War Department is to refuse to muster and pay any officer who has not performed at least some duty under his commission. I had a similar case myself which was rejected by the War Department. We have passed a law if the man returned from captivity and served one day his pay shall go back and commence with the date of his commission. I hope this bill will pass. This man served well and was only prevented by captivity with the enemy from being mustered in under his commission; and I do not think because of that fact he should be denied his rights.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. The gentleman from Wisconsin misunderstands this case. This man did serve; he was in the battle of Gettysburg, and while wounded was taken prisoner and held as such by the enemy for a long time. His commission was issued, but he failed to get it on account of his imprisonment.

Mr. McKEE. I will state another fact that, notwithstanding the statement of the gentleman from Wisconsin, no other person was appointed in this man's place or received pay for it.

Mr. COBB. If the gentleman is correct then the report is wrong.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, called for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was disagreed to.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. McKEE, from the Committee on Claims, reported back adversely the petition of Mary Riggles and the memorial of Chaplain Gonzales; and the same were laid on the table.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, from the Committee of Claims, made adverse reports in the following cases; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed:

House bill No. 198, for the relief of Alexander W. McConnell, together with the petition accompanying the same, praying compensation for property and stores taken by United States troops at Savannah, Georgia; and

The petition of James Todd, administrator of Samuel P. Todd, deceased, late purser in the United States Navy, praying reimbursement for losses sustained by him on clothing.

ALMANSON EATON.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, from the same committee, reported a joint resolution for the relief of Almonson Eaton, receiver of public money for the land office at Stevens Point, Wisconsin; which was read a first and second time.

The bill authorizes the proper accounting officer in settling the account of the petitioner, upon satisfactory evidence being made and filed, to credit to him the sum of $2,092 72 of the public money lost and destroyed by fire from the burning of the offices, books, papers, and the public money of the register and receiver at Stevens Point on the night of December 29, 1865.

Mr. ROSS called for the reading of the report.

The report was read, and at the conclusion of the reading the morning hour expired, and the bill went over until Friday next.

PETROLEUM COMPANY OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. HENDERSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to incorporate the Petroleum Company of Washington city; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE.

The SPEAKER announced as the next business in order the consideration of bill of the House No. 889, to regulate the civil service of the United States and promote the efficiency thereof, on which Mr. HALE was entitled to the floor.

Mr. HALE. As I understand there are other matters of business that will come up to-day which render it desirable that this bill should give way to them, and as I have to leave to-day, I will yield the floor to my colleague on the committee, [Mr. SCHENCK.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield to my colleague, [Mr. DELANO,] who wishes to proceed with the Private Calendar.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DELANO. Mr. Speaker, there are one or two very meritorious claims on the Private Calendar. This, I understand, is objection day, and probably the last objection day that will occur during the session. I am authorized by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. ANCONA,] who expects soon to announce the death of his colleague, to state that before he takes the floor we may have half an hour for the consideration of the Private Calendar. For that purpose I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. It will be understood, if there is no objection, that at half past two o'clock to-day business will be suspended, and the floor will be assigned to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ANCONA] to announce the death of his colleague, Mr. JOHNSON.

There was no objection.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

The House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House, (Mr. BOUTWELL in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of bills and joint resolutions on the Private Calendar as on "objection day;" which were disposed of as follows:

Those bills on the Private Calendar which had been heretofore called to which less than five members objected were laid aside; and those called for the first time to which no objection was made were likewise laid aside to be reported to the House.

JOHN R. BECKLEY.

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 174) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to audit and pay the claim of John R. Beckley.

No objection being made, the joint resolution was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

SUFFERERS BY PORTLAND FIRE.

An act (S. No. 425) for the relief of the sufferers by the late fire in Portland.

Mr. DELANO. I suppose it is hardly desirable to take this up to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will be considered as objected to.

JOHN T. JONES.

A bill (S. No. 122) for the relief of John T. Jones, an Ottawa Indian, for depredations committed by white persons upon his property in Kansas Territory.

Mr. DELANO. I know nothing of this bill. The CHAIRMAN. It will be considered as objected to.

DONAHUE, RYAN, AND SECOR.

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 141) for the relief of Donahue, Ryan & Secor, builders of the iron-clad monitor Camanche. [Objected to.]

BOLMER AND WEBER.

A bill (H. R. No. 821) for the relief of Bolmer & Weber, of St. Louis, Missouri. [Objected to.]

GOLDSMITH BROTHERS.

An act (S. No. 192) for the relief of Goldsmith Brothers, of the city of San Francisco, California, and Portland, Oregon, brokers. [Objected to.]

E. J. CURLEY.

A bill (S. No. 448) for the relief of E. J. Curley.

Less than five objections being made, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

The Clerk, having concluded the reading of the bills subject to five objections, then proceeded to read those subject to one objection.

MRS. EMMA A. PORCH.

A bill (H. R. No. 1094) for the relief of Mrs. Emma A. Porch. [Objected to.]

GEORGE HENRY PREBLE.

A bill (S. No. 176) for the relief of George Henry Preble, a commander in the Navy of the United States. [Objected to.]

There being no further bills upon the Calendar subject to one objection, the Clerk proceeded to read the bills remaining on it subject to five objections.

MRS. EMMA A. PORCH.

A bill (H. R. No. 1094) for the relief of Mrs. Emma A. Porch.

Less than five members objecting, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

GEORGE HENRY PREBLE.

A bill (S. No. 176) for the relief of George Henry Preble, a commander in the Navy of the United States. [Objected to.]

Mr. DELANO. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BOUTWELL reported that the Committee of the Whole House had had under consideration the Private Calendar, and had instructed him to report to the House a joint resolution and two bills with the recommendation that they do pass.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution and bills reported by the committee.

JOHN R. BECKLEY.

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 174) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to audit and pay the claim of John R. Beckley.

Mr. DELANO. I demand the previous question on the joint resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and, being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DELANO moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

E. J. CURLEY.

A bill (S. No. 443) for the relief of E. J. Curley.

Mr. DELANO. I demand the previous question on that bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DELANO moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MRS. EMMA A. PORCH.

A bill (H. R. No. 1094) for the relief of Mrs. Emma A. Porch.

Mr. DELANO. I move the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DELANO moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONGRESSIONAL PRINTER.

Mr. LAFLIN. The Committee on Printing, which is authorized to report at any time, have instructed me to report a bill providing for the election of a congressional printer.

The bill was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was read at length. The first section provides that the House of Representatives shall elect viva voce some competent person, who shall be a practical printer, to take charge of and manage the Government Printing Office.

The second section provides that the person so elected shall be deemed an officer of the House of Representatives, and shall be denominated "Congressional Printer," and shall hold his office for two years and until his successor shall be elected. He shall print and bind the Journals and such other documents as may be ordered by each House of Congress; and shall execute all the printing and binding for the Executive Departments now required by law to be executed at the Government office; and shall in all respects be governed by the laws in force in relation to the Superintendent of Public Printing, and the execution of the printing and binding.

The third section provides that from and after the passage of this act, and the election of a Congressional Printer in pursuance thereof, the office of Superintendent of Public Printing shall be abolished.

The fourth section provides that this act shall take effect from and after its passage; and all laws inconsistent with its provisions are hereby repealed.

Mr. ROSS. I would inquire how this bill comes before the House at this time?

The SPEAKER. It was reported from the Committee on Printing, which is authorized to report at any time.

As the question was raised the other day in regard to the authority of another committee, the Committee on Enrolled Bills, to report original bills or resolutions under the general authority to report at any time, the Chair will state that it has been decided upon appeal that the Committee on Printing is not confined merely to resolutions for printing copies of documents, but it can also at any time report bills and joint resolutions pertaining to the subject of printing.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. LAFLIN. This bill explains itself; its provisions are short and so plain that they can be clearly understood by every member of the House who has given his attention to its reading. The object of the bill is to place the control of the Government Printing Office in the hands of Congress; that being the body which is chiefly responsible for the heavy expenditures made in that office, it has been thought proper that upon them should devolve the responsibility of selecting the individual to manage that office.

It is needless for me to occupy the time of the House by any further explanation of why it has been thought expedient by the Committee on Printing to recommend the passage of this bill. The committee do not desire to press the subject upon the House without due and proper consideration. If there is any one here who desires to discuss this question I am perfectly willing—in the mean time retaining possession of the floor—to give him such an opportunity. I believe in a matter of this magnitude, in regard to which there may properly be a just difference of opinion, it is due to those who may differ with the committee that they should have an opportunity to express that difference. I do not care to press this subject to an immediate consideration without affording such an opportunity. This session being so near its close I trust no member of the House will consider me as ungenerous if I ask that any one who may choose to submit his views in opposition to this bill will do so in as short a time as possible—will condense his views into as brief a space as he can.

And now, if there is any one who desires to speak, either in favor of or in opposition to this bill, I will give him the opportunity, retaining, as I have already said, my control of the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that it is the desire of the Pennsylvania delegation to take the floor at half past two o'clock, to announce the death of their late colleague, Mr. JOHNSON.

Mr. ROSS. I would suggest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAFLIN] that as this is a new measure and just introduced, it had better be postponed until next week, and in the mean time the bill can be printed.

Mr. LAFLIN. I cannot consent to that arrangement. As gentlemen are well aware, it is now so late in the session that if this bill should encounter the veto of the President it will be impossible for us to pass it over that veto, unless it should now be passed at once.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us vote now.

Mr. LAFLIN. As there seems to be no one who cares to discuss this subject, I now call the previous question.

Upon seconding the demand for the previous question, upon a division, there were—ayes 80, noes 23.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered; which was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. TRIMBLE. I move that the bill be laid on the table; and upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and upon a division, there were—ayes 21, noes 87; not one fifth voting in the affirmative.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. FINCK called for tellers.

Mr. CONKLING. I suggest that we take the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill. We do not want them twice on substantially the same question.

Mr. FINCK. Has the bill been printed?

The SPEAKER. It has not been.

Mr. FINCK. What is the necessity of rushing through the House a bill of this kind to-day which has not been printed?

Mr. CONKLING. We propose to elect a printer that we may have this and other bills printed. [Laughter.]

Mr. NIBLACK. I beg to appeal to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAFLIN] to let the bill lie over till next week.

Mr. FINCK. I insist on my call for tellers. Tellers were ordered.

The SPEAKER. Twenty-five members—a sufficient number to call the yeas and nays—have voted to order tellers. If there be no objection the Chair will consider the yeas and nays as ordered.

There was no objection.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a bill and joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 490) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Idaho," approved March 3, 1863; and Joint resolution (S. R. No. 157) in relation to ocean mail service between San Francisco, in California, and Portland, in Oregon.

DEATH OF HON. PHILIP JOHNSON.

The SPEAKER. The hour of half past two o'clock having arrived, the Chair, in pursuance of the arrangement agreed to by unanimous consent, recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. ANCONA], who takes the floor to announce the death of his colleague, Mr. JOHNSON.

Mr. ANCONA. Mr. Speaker, it has become my melancholy duty to announce to the House the death of a friend and colleague, Hon. PHILIP JOHNSON, a member of this House from the State of Pennsylvania. This sad event occurred on Thursday evening, at eight o'clock, at his rooms in this city. Though suffering with a chronic disease for the past three years, preventing his attendance here nearly all of last and up to a recent period of this session, the immediate cause of his death was a cold contracted a week ago, when last he participated with great earnestness in the discussions in this House, resulting in congestion of the lungs.

PHILIP JOHNSON was born in Warren county, New Jersey, January 17, 1818. In 1839 he removed with his father to Northampton county, Pennsylvania. He was educated at Lafayette College, Easton, Pennsylvania, spent several years teaching school in the South, after which he studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1848, soon afterward elected clerk of the courts, and in 1853 and 1854 to the State Legislature from Northampton county. In 1860 he was the revenue commissioner for the third judicial district of the State, and was elected the same year a Representative from Pennsylvania to the Thirty-Seventh Congress; reelected in 1862 and 1864 to the Thirty-Eighth and Thirty-Ninth Congresses.

Mr. JOHNSON was a man of positive convictions, sound judgment, quick of comprehension, and earnest in his advocacy of measures he believed right. Of stern integrity and unquestioned fidelity to the principles of his political faith, with manners which to those who did not know him well might have appeared somewhat brusque, he possessed great kindness of heart and was devoted in his friendships.

It was my privilege to enjoy an intimate acquaintance with him since we first met in this city, in July, 1861; for a time occupying the same rooms in common with two other colleagues of congenial sentiment, one of whom (the late Hon. Thomas B. Cooper) passed to that home from whose bourn no traveler returns, long since. I visited him frequently during his illness, seeking and profiting by his counsels—always clear, comprehensive, and correct. He died as he lived, calmly, and in full possession of all his mental faculties. Surrounded by his sorrowing relatives and friends, his spirit took its departure from the earthly tenement, leaving it undisturbed, with features placid and serene as in life, so that it could hardly be realized as death.

Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the House has heard with deep emotion the announcement of the death of Hon. PHILIP JOHNSON, a member of this House from the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That this House tenders to the relatives of the deceased the expression of its sympathy on this afflicting event, and as a testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased the members and officers of the House will go into mourning by wearing crape on the left arm for the residue of the session.

Resolved, That the members of the House will attend the funeral of the deceased from the Hall of the House of Representatives at eleven o'clock a. m. to-morrow; and that a committee of arrangements of nine members be appointed to superintend the same.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate a copy of the foregoing resolutions to the widow of the deceased; and, further, that he communicate these proceedings to the Senate, with the request that it unite in the ceremonies of this occasion.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, in seconding the resolutions which have been offered by my colleague from the Berks district, I beg leave to add my tribute of respect to the character of my deceased friend. He had many admirable traits, was kind-hearted, generous, manly, and of unquestioned integrity and fidelity to his convictions of duty. He served several years in the Legislature of Pennsylvania. It was there that I first formed his acquaintance and began to appreciate his value. He was an active, efficient member of the body, and was devoted to the interests of his constituents, among whom his popularity grew as their knowledge of him extended. When opportunity offered for sending him to a wider sphere of usefulness they elected him as their Representative to the Thirty-Seventh Congress. He was reelected to the Thirty-Eighth and Thirty-Ninth, when failing health admonished him to decline the nomination, which would have been freely given him, to the Fortieth.

During much of the last and present sessions he has been largely withdrawn from active participation in the proceedings of the House; but his mind was equally intent upon the great questions now engaging the attention of the nation, and when last in the House about a week since he participated in debate.

His views on public affairs were decided, and he never shrank from their assertion or vindication, yet he never heedlessly obtruded them, nor allowed them to weaken the ties of friendship. His ill health often weighed upon his spirits and occasionally made him appear despondent.

Mr. JOHNSON had few advantages in early life. Until he reached manhood he was comparatively untrained. But, appreciating the importance of education, he roused himself to the required effort, and by his own labor supported himself and paid the expenses of a collegiate course at Lafayette College, after which he turned his attention to the study of law and soon became a practitioner at the bar.

His mind was clear and quick; he had a good delivery and easy power of expression. His friends were warmly attached to him because of his manliness and truthfulness. He will be much missed in his town and district, at the bar and in the social circle. I lament his death as of a friend I have long known and highly esteemed.

Mr. Speaker, this is another loud admonition to us all. But a few days since a highly valued friend, H. S. Magraw, Esq., a member of the Maryland Legislature, and a warm personal and political friend of the deceased, was stricken down in full health by apoplexy. While watching over his insensible condition I received the startling news that PHILIP JOHNSON was dead. They have both passed together into immortality. How important that we, while using our best energies to reconstruct our Government for time, should not fail to use proper exertions for reconstruction personally for eternity.

Mr. BOYER. Mr. Speaker, the shadow of death has again fallen upon us, and one who was familiar here during six eventful years will be seen in this place no more! I stood by his bedside on the evening of his death. He was then near the hour of his dissolution, and struggling with the agony of his disease; but calm and patient and uncomplaining, as he had always been through the whole period of his protracted illness. His was a nature not easily depressed nor discouraged, and yet never over hopeful nor exultant. The state of his health made it necessary for him of late to be frequently absent from his place in this House; but he was never away from choice, and when present no one was a more vigilant and conscientious observer of passing events.

Although the district which I have the honor to represent lies adjoining to the one lately represented by the deceased, I had not, until I met him here, the pleasure of his intimate personal acquaintance. But the more I learned to know him the more I admired the sterling virtues which distinguished him. His qualities were all of the solid kind. There was nothing about him which was meant for show alone. He was plain and unassuming, and what might be termed old-fashioned in his manners; sometimes blunt but never gross or wantonly offensive. His wit, which was often pungent, was never barbed with malice. His exuberant humor and quick perception of the ludicrous never left him even in his sickness; and he remained till almost the day of his death a most genial and cheerful companion. He had many friends. His enemies were few; for he was amiable, forgiving, and without deceit. Candid and generous himself, he could not tolerate the opposite in others, and if the fires of his sarcasm were ever meant to scorch it was when provoked to indignation by a mean action, which his soul abhorred.

His character was decided. He was not in the habit of halting long between two opinions; and although never obstinately closed to conviction, he did not often find occasion to change his mind, for his judgment was clear and practical. Indeed, the most distinguishing quality of his mind was his plain common sense. He adhered with great fidelity to the political party to which he belonged; not for office or emolument, but from convictions of right and a sense of public duty. His public and private character were equally above reproach. By the death of PHILIP JOHNSON Pennsylvania has lost an incorruptible Representative, and those who were associated with him in life have lost a friend, the recollection of whose solid merits and mirthful pleasantries will long survive and keep his memory green amid the fading years.

Mr. STROUSE. Mr. Speaker, having been intimately acquainted for years with Mr. JOHNSON, I feel it a duty on this sad occasion to express my deep regret at the loss of one whom I was proud to call my friend. Nearly thirty years ago Mr. JOHNSON came to Northampton county, Pennsylvania, and settled in Easton, the county town. His industry, ability, and honorable conduct very soon secured him troops of friends, and he became deservedly one of the most popular men in northeastern Pennsylvania. Of this the many positions of trust and responsibility conferred upon him, not by executive appointment, but by the free suffrage of the people of his district, afford the best evidence. For three successive terms they chose him as their Representative in this House; and such was their confidence in his sterling integrity and ability that he would have been again their choice at the last election had he not peremptorily declined a renomination on account of his failing health.

In every relation of life he maintained an unsullied and spotless character, and even those who differed with him on questions of governmental policy readily acknowledged his honesty of purpose and true patriotism. As a man he was what is well designated the noblest work of God—"an honest man." As a husband he was most affectionate and kind. As a counselor he was reliable and conscientious; and in the forum, both in the State and in the councils of the nation, he was candid, truthful, patriotic, and honorable. As a friend, I can well say he was warm-hearted and sincere, ever ready to aid those in need and extending his generous hand to those who by misfortune were thrown upon an uncharitable world.

His kindness of heart was touchingly manifested at the time when the three years' troops were raised in 1863. Several companies of volunteers from Mr. JOHNSON's district were ordered to report at Pottsville, my home, for the purpose of joining the regiment then forming in my district. At that time Mr. JOHNSON wrote me several letters requesting me most earnestly to see to it for him, that "the boys from old Northampton" were well cared for and to do all I could for the comfort of the soldiers from his district, adding that any disbursement of money I might make he would gladly repay. Acts and conduct like these express more genuine patriotism than all the windy harangues of the politician.

But he is gone from our midst! While we mourn his loss—a loss indeed to the devoted and faithful partner of his bosom as well as to his district, State, and the nation—we can console ourselves by the knowledge that the virtues manifested by him in this world have secured him a place in the bright realms of our Heavenly Father. May his honorable course of conduct be imitated by men of our country; and when our time comes—when the last bell shall toll for us—may we be prepared to appear at the bar of that great tribunal from which there is no appeal, and may we so have lived as our good departed friend has lived, to truly earn the title of "good and faithful servant." Requiescat in pace.

The resolutions submitted by Mr. ANCONA were unanimously adopted.

The SPEAKER. In accordance with uniform usage, the committee of arrangements was named by the Speaker yesterday. At the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. ANCONA,] he was excused, and his colleague [Mr. GLOSSBRENNER] was appointed chairman of the committee; and the Chair has also appointed the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. SITGREAVES] in place of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. HARDING,] who also requested to be excused. The committee is as follows: Hons. ANDREW J. GLOSSBRENNER, of Pennsylvania; JOHN B. ALLEY, of Massachusetts; JAMES K. MOORHEAD, of Pennsylvania; CHARLES A. ELDRIDGE, of Wisconsin; JOHN A. NICHOLSON, of Delaware; WILLIAM E. FINCK, of Ohio; THOMAS W. FERRY, of Michigan; WILLIAM E. NIBLACK, of Indiana, and CHARLES SITGREAVES, of New Jersey.

And then (at two o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the Speaker declared the House adjourned till Monday next.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, February 4, 1867.

On motion of Mr. STEWART, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of Saturday was dispensed with.

WISCONSIN SENATORS.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of Wisconsin instructing Hon. JAMES R. DOOLITTLE to resign his seat in the United States Senate; which were ordered to lie upon the table and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CONNESS presented the petition of John Clark, a soldier of the Mexican war and a pensioner, praying for an increase of his pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HOWE presented a memorial of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, in favor of the establishment of a mail route from the city of Milwaukee to Painsville in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CHANDLER. I rise to present a memorial of citizens of Michigan, which I will read:

"We the inhabitants of the State of Michigan, vessel-builders and owners, desire to set forth the following facts and circumstances and petition your honorable body for relief:

"In consequence of the laws of the United States prohibiting foreign-built vessels from coasting in the waters of the United States, and the business of freighting being far more profitable in our country than in Canada, the owners of vessels in Canada and England are applying to your honorable body to enact special laws registering their vessels in the United States, against which we the undersigned beg leave most respectfully to enter our solemn protest, and therefore set forth a few facts and reasons for the same.

"Owing to the enormous debt of the United States and the absolute necessity of providing not only for the interest but the gradual reduction of the principal, your honorable body has been compelled to levy large taxes upon almost every branch of industry in our country, which has raised the prices of all commodities to a fearful extent, causing the necessity of high prices for labor and rendering vessel-building unprofitably high in our States, while in Canada, under their small debt and light taxation, it being comparatively new and sparsely settled, provisions and labor very low, the abundance of and convenience to water communication of her timber, vessels can be built there at about one half the cost they can in the waters of the United States.

"And if Congress continues to permit the Canadian vessels to become registered in the United States free from the enormous expense we are subjected to, it gives foreigners not only a preference over our own vessel-building and business, but must eventually retard ship-building in our country and throw large numbers of mechanics and laborers out of employment.

"Even at the present time there are a large number of vessels being built in Canada with the intention of getting them registered in the United States.

"There are other and perhaps stronger arguments which might be given why foreign vessels should not be registered in the United States; but those already given, we believe, are quite sufficient.

"We therefore pray that your honorable body will hereafter cease to register any more foreign vessels in the United States; and your petitioners in duty bound will ever pray."

This memorial is numerously signed by our most extensive merchants and ship-builders. I ask its reference to the Committee on Commerce.

It was so referred.

Mr. HOWARD presented a petition of citizens of Michigan, praying for a survey of the Kalamazoo river and harbor so far as it impedes navigation, and an appropriation for the improvement of that harbor; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the supervisors of the county of Muskegon, in the State of Michigan, praying that the land included in township No. 12, north of range No. 15 west, in the State of Michigan, now held as an Indian reservation, may be placed in the market; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Michigan, who had settled upon and improved lands in Mason county in that State, which were afterward granted to the railroad from Pere Marquette to Flint by an act of Congress, praying for the adoption of measures for their relief; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SUMNER presented a resolution of the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts, in favor of an appropriation for the protection of certain headlands and bluffs and the removal of certain obstructions in Boston harbor; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS presented the memorial of Frances Ann McCauley, widow of Daniel S. McCauley, praying for compensation for the judicial services of her husband as consul general at Tripoli, Barbary, and Alexandria, in Egypt; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. COWAN presented a memorial of citizens of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the passage of any law authorizing the curtailment of the national currency, or a return within a limited time to specie payments, and against compelling all national banks to redeem their notes in New York, or prohibiting them from paying or receiving interest on bank balances; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of bankers of the city of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, remonstrating against any alterations in the provisions of the act to provide a national currency; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PATTERSON presented a resolution of the Legislature of Tennessee in favor of an amendment to the act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts, approved July 2, 1863, so as to enable the State of Tennessee to accept the benefit of the provisions of that act; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented the petition of James H. Norwood, praying to be compensated for his services as assistant assessor of internal revenue in the first district of South Carolina; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WILSON presented a communication addressed to him as chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, by the Secretary of War, inclosing a report of General Grant in regard to military operations in connection with Indian affairs; which was ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 632) to authorize the building of a military and postal railroad from Washington, District of Columbia, to the city of New York, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 500) to amend the twenty-first section of an act entitled "An act to amend the several acts heretofore passed to provide for the enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 24, 1863, reported it with a recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed; which was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 534) to provide for the allotment of the members of the Supreme Court among the circuits, and for the appointment of marshals for the Supreme Court and for the District of Columbia, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 902) to declare the sense of an act entitled "An act to restrict the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, and to provide for the payment of certain demands for quartermasters' stores and subsistence supplies furnished to the Army of the United States," reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a resolution, submitted by Mr. DAVIS on the 12th of December, 1865, declaratory of the principles of the Constitution in relation to the writ of habeas corpus, reported it with a recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 84) to regulate the time and places of holding the district court of the United States within and for the district of Maine, reported it with a recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed; which was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SUMNER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 563) supplementary to the several acts of Congress abolishing imprisonment for debt; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FESSENDEN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 163) to provide in certain cases for the removal of alcohol from bonded warehouse free from internal tax; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

CLAIMS OF LOYAL EAST TENNESSEANS.

Mr. PATTERSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested, if in his judgment not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to the Senate the order of General Burnside organizing a commission for the adjudication of claims for property taken from the loyal people of East Tennessee for the use of the Army; also the order of General Schofield organizing a commission for the same purpose, together with the names of the claimants and the several amounts of the claims so adjudicated by the commissions organized by General Burnside and General Schofield.

SAND CREEK MASSACRE.

Mr. POMEROY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to furnish the Senate a copy of the evidence taken at Denver and Fort Lyon, Colorado Territory, by a military commission, of which Colonel S. F. Tappan, Veteran battalion first Colorado cavalry, was president, ordered to inquire into and report all the facts connected with the so-called Sand Creek massacre in 1864.

CHANGE OF REFERENCES.

On motion of Mr. FOWLER, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. No. 557) for the relief of James Fulton, paymaster United States Navy, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

PAYMENT OF KENTUCKY MILITIA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will take this opportunity to lay before the Senate the joint resolution (S. R. No. 94) providing for the payment of certain Kentucky militia forces, which has been returned from the House of Representatives with an amendment.

Mr. WILSON. That resolution comes back from the House of Representatives with a slight amendment intended to guard it more carefully, I understand. I hope the Senate will concur in the amendment.

Mr. GRIMES. Let us hear it read.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to add at the end of the resolution the following:

And no allowance shall be made for any troops which did not perform actual military service in full connection and cooperation with the authorities of the United States and subject to their orders.

The amendment was concurred in.

COMPENSATION OF TENNESSEE SENATORS.

Mr. HARRIS. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a communication from the Secretary of the Senate in relation to the compensation of the Senators from the State of Tennessee, to report the following resolution on the subject:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to pay to the Senators from the State of Tennessee the compensation allowed by law, to be computed from the commencement of the Thirty-Ninth Congress.

I should like to have the resolution acted upon now.

There being no objection, the resolution was read twice, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I merely wish to say in regard to that resolution that in my judgment, according to the practice of the Senate, the Senators from Tennessee were entitled to compensation from the time the State of Tennessee was recognized by act of Congress to be entitled to representation, and not before. The majority of the committee thought differently and propose to pay them from the commencement of the Congress. It is a matter that I shall take up no time about, but it seems to me if that is settled to be the rule when we come to admit Senators, as some time or other we shall, from the State of South Carolina and other States, they will claim compensation from the commencement of their terms, going back two or three Congresses. I do not see upon what principle this resolution can be passed, except it is that the State of Tennessee was entitled to representation all the time, and therefore that the persons selected as Senators are entitled to be paid from the time the term commenced.

Mr. WILSON. What committee is that from?

Mr. TRUMBULL. From the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. WILSON. I hope we shall have no further action on this subject at present. We should consider the matter. I move that it lie over until to-morrow.

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes 14, noes 12; no quorum voting.

Mr. DOOLITTLE called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator from Massachusetts wishes to look into this matter for his own information I have no objection to the resolution being laid over; otherwise, it being a personal question, I think it ought to be settled now.

Mr. WILSON. I will simply say that it seems to me to be a most extraordinary proposition, and I want time to reflect on a matter of this kind. It seems to me to involve a principle that would place us in a very ridiculous attitude before the country.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator says that he wants to examine into this question, I consent that the resolution shall lie over.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Upon the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts that he desires to look into this matter a little further, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote last taken discloses the want of a quorum, and the Chair must count the Senate to ascertain if there be a quorum present. [After counting.] The Chair ascertains by counting the Senate that a quorum is present. The call for the yeas and nays can be withdrawn by unanimous consent, and the further consideration of this resolution may be postponed until to-morrow by unanimous consent. Is there any objection? No objection being made the call is withdrawn, and the further consideration of the resolution postponed until to-morrow.

RAILROADS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. STEWART. I move to take up for consideration the bill (S. No. 461) to aid in the construction of the San Francisco Central Pacific railroad.

Mr. WILSON. I hope that bill will not be taken up this morning. I think a bill so long as that ought not to be taken up in the morning hour. There are a great many small bills, for the consideration of which the only chance is the morning hour. The bill now proposed to be taken up is a large bill, and it will take a long time to read it.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not know what the Senator means when he calls this a large bill.

Mr. WILSON. A long one.

Mr. CONNESS. If the Senator had been informed he would have known that the bill had been already read in the Senate, and has been postponed now for nearly two weeks. It is not as large a bill as the Senator imagines, but it is of great consequence to us. I hope the Senate will consider it now, for there is no opportunity to consider such business unless it be during the morning hour.

The motion of Mr. STEWART was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 461) to aid in the construction of the San Francisco Central Pacific railroad.

The bill, after having been considered heretofore, was recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands, and reported with an amendment to strike out all of the original bill after the enacting clause, and insert the following:

That the right of way through the public lands be, and the same is hereby, granted to the State of California, in trust for the San Francisco Central Pacific Railroad Company, or for the California Pacific Railroad Company, corporations existing under the laws of the State of California, to construct the road hereinafter named, and for the successors and assigns of that one of said companies as shall have first completed with the terms of this act, and shall first complete such road, for the construction of a railroad from the city of Sacramento, or Marysville, or from both of said points, through the counties of Yuba, Sutter, Yolo, and Solano, to a point at or near the City of Benicia or Vallejo, in the last named county, in said State; and the right is hereby given to that one of said corporations as shall first comply with the terms of this act to take from the public lands hereby granted adjacent to the line of such railroad material for the construction thereof; said right of way is granted to such railroad to the extent of one hundred feet in width on each side of the center of such road where it may pass over the public lands; also all necessary grounds for station buildings, depots, machine-shops, switches, side-tracks, turn-tables, and water-stations, not exceeding five acres in any continuous ten miles of said line.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That there be, and is hereby, granted to the State of California, to aid in the construction of that one of the above-mentioned railroads as shall be first completed according to the terms of this act, and to secure the safe and speedy transportation of mails, troops, munitions of war, and public stores over the route of said line of railway, every alternate section of public land designated by odd numbers, to the amount of ten alternate sections per mile, on each side of said railroad line, as said company may adopt, wherever in the line thereof the United States have full title thereto, respectively; but in case it shall appear that the United States have, when the line or route of said road is definitely located, as hereinafter provided, sold any section or any part thereof, granted as aforesaid, or that the right of preemption, homestead settlement, or other private right, has attached, or that the same has been reserved by the United States, then it shall be lawful, within two years thereafter, for any agent or agents, to be appointed by the Governor of said State, to select, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, from the lands of the United States (to which no right has attached, and not being within the limits of any reservation as aforesaid) nearest to the tiers of sections above specified, so much land in alternate sections, or parts of sections, as shall be equal to such lands as have been sold, reserved, or otherwise appropriated, or to which the right of preemption or homestead settlement shall have, at the time of the location of said road attached, as aforesaid, which lands shall, when said road shall be completed as herein provided, be held and disposed of by the State of California for the use and purpose aforesaid: Provided, That the lands to be so located shall in no case be further than twenty-five miles from the line of said road: Provided, further, That the lands hereby granted shall be exclusively applied toward the cost of the construction of said railroad, for and on account of which the said lands are hereby granted, and the title thereto shall remain in the United States until said road shall be fully completed, and the same shall be applied to no other purpose whatsoever: Provided, further, That any and all lands heretofore reserved to the United States by any act of Congress, or granted, appropriated, or set apart for, or promised to any other railroad company, or for any other purpose, and all lands containing gold, silver, or cinnabar, and all town and village lots are hereby reserved from the operations of this act, except so far as it may be found necessary to locate the route of said road through such reserved lands, in which case the right of way only to the extent of one hundred feet wide shall be granted, subject to the approval of the President of the United States.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That whenever the surveyor general of the United States for the State of California shall first certify to the Secretary of the Interior that such railroad is completed from Sacramento city or Marysville to Benicia or Vallejo, in a good and substantial manner, and in all respects as required by this act, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to transfer to the Governor of said State all lands granted as aforesaid.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the said railroad shall be constructed in a substantial and workmanlike manner, with all the necessary drains, culverts, bridges, viaducts, crossings, turnouts, and watering places, and all other appurtenances, including furniture and rolling-stock, equal in all respects to railroads of the first class when prepared for business; the gauge to be the same as that of the Central Pacific railroad.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That as soon as the lines of said road shall be surveyed and located the Governor of said State shall cause a map of the location to be filed with the Secretary of the Interior, who thereupon shall cause lands not already surveyed, within twenty miles of the line of said location, to be surveyed, and the odd sections and parts of sections not occupied by homestead settlements, or otherwise hereinafter excepted, to be set apart for the purposes contemplated by this act. And the sections and parts of sections of land which by the aforesaid grant shall remain in the United States within ten miles on each side of said road shall not, before the 4th of July, 1872, be sold for less than double the minimum price of public lands when sold.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That each and every grant, right, and privilege herein are so made and given to said State for the purpose aforesaid, upon and subject to the following conditions, namely: that the said company shall commence the work on said road within six months from the approval of this act by the President, and shall complete the road from Sacramento city to Benicia or Vallejo within three years thereafter, and the road from Marysville to Benicia or Vallejo on or before the 4th day of July, 1871.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That in case either of said companies shall elect, and file such election with the secretary of state for the State of California, within six months from the passage of this act, to the effect that said company will only connect by railroad the said city of Benicia or Vallejo with the main road at a distance not exceeding twelve miles from the city of Benicia, and abandon the construction of the balance of the aforesaid road, then and in that event the company so electing shall, subject to all the conditions and provisions aforesaid, be entitled to the benefit of one quarter of the grant hereby made, and in case the said election shall not be filed as herein required, and the said connection shall not be completed as in this act provided, the whole of the hereby granted lands shall, when said whole line is completed as aforesaid, be held by said State for the benefit and use of the company complying with the terms of this act.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the lands hereby granted to said State, mentioned as aforesaid, shall be conveyed and transferred to said company, as the Legislature of said State may provide for the purposes aforesaid.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAULSBURY. As these new States, western States, are getting all the public lands within their limits, and the old States get none given to them, I propose an additional section to this bill for the benefit of my own State.

And be it further enacted, That two hundred thousand acres of the public lands of the United States, to be located as shall be directed by the Secretary of the Interior, be granted to the Junction and Breakwater railroad, in the State of Delaware.

I will say, Mr. President, that this road is not completed, and an appropriation of the public domain would be of great service to the company to enable them to complete their road. I am aware of no grant of public lands to any of the old States to aid them in the construction of public works or for any other purpose, unless it be the act passed a few years ago which provided for granting to the States thirty thousand acres of land for each of their members in Congress, for educational purposes. I think that we on the Atlantic coast have as much interest in the public lands as gentlemen on the Pacific coast and in the far West; and while the public lands are being given away it is nothing but just that we should have some portion of them. If there were not a proposition before the Senate to grant public lands to assist in the construction of railroads in the western States and the States on the Pacific coast I should not offer this amendment.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope the honorable Senator, if he wants public lands for the State of Delaware, will make the experiment on a bill to be introduced by him here, and not incur the present bill with such an amendment. I presume the Senator is not quite in earnest in the matter.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not think this amendment will incur this bill at all. If Senators are opposed to my amendment it is a very easy matter for them to vote it down. I certainly shall not take up the time of the Senate in discussing the question, but I know of no more proper case than the one before the Senate to get the sense of the Senate on the question whether we of the Atlantic border, we of the old States, shall have any interest in these public lands and receive any benefit from their distribution.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate, as amended, and the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed. Its title was made to read, "A bill for a grant of land to the State of California to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State."

COMPENSATION OF CIVIL EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution No. 224.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 224) giving additional compensation to certain employés in the civil service of the Government at Washington.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending amendment will be read.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask the consent of the Senate to withdraw the amendment that I reported from the Committee on Finance, and to substitute another, which I am instructed by the committee to report in place of it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to withdraw the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance to this joint resolution. An amendment to that amendment having been proposed, and being now pending, the original amendment cannot be withdrawn without the consent of the Senate. Is there any objection? No objection being made the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I now offer the amendment which I submitted informally a few days ago, to strike out all after the resolving clause of the joint resolution and insert the following:

That there shall be allowed and paid, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the following described persons, now employed in the civil service at Washington, as follows: to civil officers, temporary and all other clerks, messengers and watchmen, and employés, male and female, in any of the following-named Departments, or any bureau or division thereof, to wit: State, Treasury, War, Navy, Interior, Post Office, Attorney General, Agricultural, and including civil officers and temporary, and all other clerks and employés, male and female, in the offices of the Coast Survey, Naval Observatory, navy-yard, Paymaster General, including the division of referred claims, Commissary General of Prisoners, Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, Quartermaster General, Capitol and Treasury extension, city post office, and Commissioner of Public Buildings, to the superintendent of meters, an additional compensation of twenty per cent. on their respective salaries as fixed by law, or, where no salary is fixed by law, upon their pay respectively, for one year from and after the 30th day of June, 1866; but when any of said persons is or shall be only entitled to receive salary or pay for a part of said year the said twenty per cent. shall be computed on the amount such person is so entitled to receive for services in any or all of said Departments or offices within said year: Provided, That the above-named additional compensation to the employés of the Patent Office shall be paid out of the funds of said office: Provided further, That the resolution shall not apply to persons whose salaries as fixed by law exceed three thousand five hundred dollars per annum, nor to any person whose salary has been increased by law since the 30th day of June, 1864, except those clerks in the office of the Quartermaster General whose pay was equalized with that of first-class clerks by act of July 28, 1866: Provided further, That all extra compensation allowed and paid to any of said persons during the current fiscal year by the head of any Department shall be taken and considered as a part of the said twenty per cent., so that all of said persons shall receive twenty per cent. on their respective salaries, as aforesaid, and no more; but no person shall be required to refund any sum that he may have received, as aforesaid, in excess of said twenty per cent. on his salary.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In listening to the reading of that portion of the amendment naming the persons to be included, watchmen, clerks, &c., I did not hear the watchmen of the Executive Mansion mentioned. There are some watchmen employed there as well as in the various Departments, and I suppose this proposition ought to apply to them as well as to the others, if we are to make it general. I suggest, therefore, that it be amended in that respect.

Mr. FESSENDEN. How much do they receive?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. When the appropriation bill was under consideration last year these watchmen called upon me and stated that their pay was less than that of the watchmen of the Capitol. I thought it would be just to put them all on the same footing, and I think such an amendment was made. If we are to act on this question now I shall move to insert the watchmen of the Executive Mansion.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to know what they receive now. I think the Senator should give us an explanation on that point, and tell us how many there are of them. He ought to know that before he moves the amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. They come within the exception.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I understood that there were two of these watchmen, and that they received the same pay as the watchmen of the Capitol.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well; that is very much larger than watchmen receive in the Departments. We have not increased in this joint resolution the compensation of the watchmen of the Capitol; it does not apply to them at all. They receive very much larger pay than those in the Departments. The pay of the employés of the Executive Mansion was fixed last year in the bill reorganizing the force there, by which they were paid very liberally and very handsomely; and if the watchmen there receive the same pay as those of the Capitol they receive a very much larger pay than in the Departments. We have not increased the pay of the watchmen of the Capitol in this joint resolution, and there is no reason why these others should be included in it.

Mr. GRIMES. I will inquire of the Senator who has charge of this joint resolution what is included in the term "employés." The joint resolution gives increased compensation to civil officers, temporary and all other clerks, messengers and watchmen, and employés, male and female, in any of the following-named Departments, enumerating several of them, and then specifying "the Coast Survey, Naval Observatory, navy-yard." Does that include the workmen of the navy-yard? Are they to be considered as "employés" under this resolution?

Mr. FESSENDEN. That would cover all the workmen, I think. It was not intended that it should.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If gentlemen will take the pains to read this amendment carefully I think they will see what it means. I think there is no difficulty in understanding it. The first clause includes all "civil officers, temporary and all other clerks, messengers and watchmen and employés, male and female, in any of the following-named Departments, or any bureau or division thereof, to wit: State, Treasury, War, Navy, Interior, Post Office, Attorney General, Agricultural." That clause includes all officers, clerks, messengers, watchmen, and employés, male and female, in the different Departments. Then it proceeds to include all "civil officers and temporary and all other clerks and employés, male and female, in the offices of the Coast Survey, Naval Observatory, navy-yard, Paymaster General," &c. The Senate will see that this applies only to those clerks and employés who are in the offices, and does not embrace the mechanics and laborers in the navy-yard or any of the other branches of business enumerated in this portion of the resolution.

Mr. RAMSEY. If it is in order to do so, I should like to move an amendment to the amendment by inserting after the words "navy-yard," in the thirteenth line, the word "arsenal." There is a large number of employés there.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] to the amendment is pending.

Mr. RAMSEY. I was not aware of that.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Perhaps I am mistaken in supposing that the watchmen at the Executive Mansion ought to be included in this joint resolution; but if the joint resolution should lie over until to-morrow morning I will look into the matter. The language of the resolution is very sweeping and goes very far, and if we undertake to make it general we ought to reach all who are in the civil service.

Mr. TRUMBULL. As this joint resolution is likely to go over, I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Oregon who has it in charge, to know whether the thirty-third and thirty-fourth lines, which exclude from the operation of the joint resolution and deny its benefits to any person whose salary has been increased by law since the 30th of June, 1864, would not deprive the female clerks who are employed in the Departments from having any benefits from this joint resolution? I think we increased their compensation slightly last year.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It would have that effect?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If that is to be the effect of it I object. I think they are paid little enough, and they ought to have the benefits of this resolution, and I trust that before it shall pass the Senate it will be amended in that particular. I know no reason why a faithful clerk, who is a female, and who performs the duties as well and as efficiently as a male, should receive but $600, as some of them do, or $720 or $900 a year, while no male clerk has less than $1,200, and then why we should increase the pay of the $1,200 clerk, who is a male, and exclude from the benefits of the act the female who gets but $900, or perhaps $600. If the intention of the joint resolution is to deny its benefits to the female clerks, I hope it will be amended before it shall be enacted into a law; and at the proper time I shall move that amendment, if no other person does, so as not to deny the female clerks in the Departments the benefits of this resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not intend to oppose any such amendment to this joint resolution, but I will state the facts by which a majority of the committee, as I understand, were influenced in directing me to report the amendment in its present shape. This resolution proceeds upon the assumption that the salaries that were fixed prior to 1864 are adequate to compensate those who are now in the employment of the Government at the present high prices. At that time these ladies received $600 per annum; subsequently their salaries were fixed at $720 per annum, and then at the last session of Congress their salaries were raised to $900 per annum. In addition to that they have each received $100 of the balance of the $225,000 which the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to distribute among those clerks who received less than $1,200.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Allow me to inquire have all the lady clerks received that?

Mr. WILLIAMS. They have.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Both the $600 and the $900 clerks?

Mr. WILLIAMS. There are no $600 ones. There are no female clerks in the Treasury Department at this time receiving $600. They all receive $900.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Allow me to inquire if they do not receive in the Quartermaster General's Department and some other Departments less than $900?

Mr. FESSENDEN. No.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is my impression.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We raised them all last year in all the Departments to $900. There were, I believe, six or eight in the Post Office Department who were accidentally left out, and this resolution will apply to them.

Mr. WILLIAMS. All the ladies, I think, who are clerks in the Departments have been paid $900; and I was about to say, in addition to that, a portion of them in the Treasury Department have received some share of the $165,000 that was put in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury for distribution at the last session of Congress. The idea that influenced the decision of the committee, as I understand, was this: that the question as to how much these ladies should receive had been before Congress and it had been determined, and was last year determined, that they should receive $900 per annum. The question of their compensation was taken up and considered, and they were allowed $900 per annum; but as to these other clerks, their salaries were fixed many years ago, and they have not been changed by subsequent legislation. It was said that as the subject of the compensation of these ladies had been considered by Congress at the last session, and as it was then the judgment of Congress that $900 per annum was an adequate compensation, this twenty per cent. ought not to apply to them. I recognize the force of the argument advanced by the Senator from Illinois, that a lady in the Treasury Department or any other Department who performs duties that are equal in importance to those devolved upon a clerk of the other sex should be entitled to receive the same compensation. I know of no particular reason why they should not receive that compensation. I have simply stated upon what idea, as I understood it, this exclusion of these ladies proceeded, without intending to oppose any amendment.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator permit me a word—

TENURE OF OFFICE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of Saturday, which is the bill (S. No. 453) regulating the tenure of certain civil offices. This bill is returned to the Senate from the House of Representatives with an amendment, and the question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] that the Senate concur in the amendment made in the bill by the House of Representatives.

Mr. POLAND. This bill returned from the House came in while the bankrupt bill was under consideration on Saturday, and it seems in some way it has obtained precedence. I desire to inquire if when this bill is completed the bankrupt bill will then be entitled to be considered?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that there are several bills in the list of special orders, the bankrupt bill among them, and the oldest special order would be entitled to priority. The Chair is not advised at this moment which, in the special orders, is the oldest special order. The Chair will state, in reply to the suggestion of the Senator, that this bill when it came from the House was laid before the Senate by the Chair to expedite business by the unanimous consent of the Senate, the Chair supposing that it would be very soon disposed of.

Mr. POLAND. I have no desire to antagonize the bankrupt bill in the order of business with the bill that is now before the Senate; but I desire to have it understood that I shall ask to have the bankrupt bill proceeded with immediately upon the disposal of this bill, whether I am entitled to it as a matter of right or not.

Mr. HOWE. I inquire if this bill has precedence of the bill in the charge of the Senator from Vermont?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it has, it being the unfinished business of Saturday, being the business in hand at the time of the adjournment. Under the rule that is the unfinished business after the expiration of the morning hour.

Mr. HOWE. How was the other bill displaced?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was displaced by the common consent of the Senate, and this bill was taken up.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It being a proposition for a committee of conference, it was not supposed that it would take any time.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think it is fair that the bankrupt bill should be displaced by the accidental fact that the question on the amendment of the House to this bill led to discussion, and thus crowded it for the rest of the session on Saturday. If it is in order, I move to lay aside the unfinished business and proceed to the consideration of the bankrupt bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope my friend from Ohio will not insist on that motion. The bill now under consideration has gone through a discussion in this body and in the House of Representatives, and has come back with one single amendment, which has been under discussion before. Now, the simple question is, it having been debated, whether we shall agree in that amendment, or whether we shall not. It is a bill which it is quite desirable, if it is to pass at all, should pass early, for reasons that it is unnecessary to mention. Therefore, I hope the Senate will be willing to proceed now with it. We shall gain time by so doing on the whole, because it is now fresh before us and we can soon dispose of it. I am not disposed to occupy time. A single vote on it will then leave us free to proceed with something else.

Mr. SHERMAN. I submit my motion, not with any desire to interfere with the order of business, but simply because I do not think it is exactly fair, when a bill comes from the House with an amendment and by common consent the question is about to be put to the Senate, to allow a long debate to intervene on that motion, thus crowding aside the pending business. It is rather contrary to the usual custom, because the action of the Senate on a House amendment is usually taken as a matter of course and rapidly disposed of, either referred, agreed to, or rejected. Certainly the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] in agreeing to waive his right to the floor, did not expect or did not intend to allow a long discussion to intervene on another subject postponing his bill. I think it is a matter of justice and fairness to the bankrupt bill that it should be disposed of one way or the other. I do not think the pending question should be pressed unless the Senate by common consent would appoint a committee of conference, which they can do by disagreeing to the House amendment, and that may expedite the action of the Senate on the bill; and if that can be done without further debate I think it will expedite the passage of the bill itself.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is precisely what I desired the Senate to do when the bill came back to us, but that was opposed by my friend from Illinois, on the ground that he wished to have a direct vote on the main question of concurrence. That having led to a little debate, I think it is right, as it is now suggested, to ask the Senate to dispose of it. It will only take but a short time, and then we can go on again with the bankrupt bill. There are peculiar reasons attending the passage of this bill which I think make it right that I should insist upon that; although I entirely agree with the Senator from Ohio, that in an ordinary and usual case it would be my duty to yield and not displace the pending business by the accidental circumstance of a debate having arisen. As it is, I hope the Senate will finish this bill.

Mr. HOWE. I wish the Senate would allow this bill to go over. I agree with the Senator from Ohio that, in justice to the bankrupt bill and those having charge of it, it ought to go over, and I should like it as a matter of personal convenience. I should like to say something upon the question on agreeing with the House of Representatives in the amendment, and I would rather not say it to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question on the motion of the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. POMEROY. What is the motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That the Senate postpone the present and all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of the bankrupt bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 24, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Foster, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, McDougall, Morgan, Nesmith, Norton, Patterson, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sumner, Van Winkle, Willey, and Yates—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Conness, Cragin, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fogg, Grimes, Howard, Kirkwood, Lane, Morrill, Trumbull, Wade, Williams, and Wilson—16.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Cowan, Creswell, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Guthrie, Johnson, Nye, Riddle, Sprague, and Stewart—12.

So the motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WADE. I rise to give notice that I shall endeavor to call up to-morrow the joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution limiting the presidential term. I do not suppose it will take very long, and I am very anxious to dispose of it. I wish it to be understood, therefore, that I shall try and get it up then.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to give notice that as soon as the bankrupt bill is disposed of I shall ask the Senate to take up the amendment of the House, which has just been laid over.

BANKRUPT BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 598) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the amendments reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The next amendment was in section thirty, line three, after "bankrupt," to insert the words "on his own application;" so as to read:

That no person who shall have been discharged under this act, and shall afterward become bankrupt, on his own application shall again be entitled to a discharge whose estate is insufficient to pay seventy per cent. of the debts proved against it, unless the assent in writing of three fourths in value of his creditors who have proved their claims is filed at or before the time of application for discharge, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out of lines eight and nine of section thirty the words "no discharge shall be granted to a debtor a third time bankrupt."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section thirty-one after the enacting clause, in these words:

That any creditor opposing the discharge of any bankrupt may, upon filing a specification in writing of the grounds of his opposition, demand that the question of the bankrupt's right to a discharge to be tried by a jury, and the same shall be so tried at a stated session of the district court, unless it be satisfactorily shown to the court that it would be unjust to the bankrupt to subject him to the expense and delay of such trial, in which case it shall be the duty of the court to refuse such trial. But only one such trial shall be had; and if the jury disagree the court shall decide upon the application as if no jury had been called; and the verdict of the jury or the decision of the court shall be final, so far as the proceedings in bankruptcy are concerned.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

That any creditor opposing the discharge of any bankrupt may file a specification in writing of the grounds of his opposition, and the court may in its discretion order any question of fact so presented to be tried at a stated session of the district court.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in lines three and four of section thirty-three, to strike out the words "executor, administrator, guardian, trustee, assignee, or factor;" and in line four to strike out the word "other" before "fiduciary," so as to make the section read:

That no debt created by the fraud or embezzlement of the bankrupt, or by his defalcation as a public officer, or while acting in any fiduciary character, shall be discharged under this act; but the debt may be proved, and the dividend thereon shall be a payment on account of said debt; and no discharge granted under this act shall release, discharge, or affect any person liable for the same debt for or with the bankrupt, either as partner, joint contractor, indorser, surety, or otherwise.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out all of section thirty-three after the word "otherwise" in line ten, as follows:

And in all proceedings in bankruptcy commenced after one year from the time this act shall go into operation, no discharge shall be granted to a debtor whose assets do not pay fifty per cent. of the claims against his estate, unless the assent in writing of a majority in number and value of his creditors who have proved their claims is filed in the case at or before the time of application for discharge.

Mr. WILSON. Before the question is taken on striking out that whole clause, I move to amend it in the eleventh and twelfth lines by striking out the words "commenced after one year from the time this act shall go into operation."

Mr. POLAND. If the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts should be adopted, and the amendment that is proposed by the Judiciary Committee as to the residue of this clause should not be adopted, it would make a very material change in this bill. The result would be that in no case whatever would a bankrupt be entitled to be discharged if his estate did not pay fifty cents on the dollar, unless the creditors assented to the discharge. I do not wish to enter into any discussion on the subject, but to state what the effect of this proposition will be. I do not think the Senate are prepared to make such an important limitation upon this subject, as would be the effect if this amendment were adopted and the residue of the clause were not stricken out. If the amendment of the Judiciary Committee is agreed to, it is immaterial what becomes of this amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, for that strikes out the whole clause.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator from Vermont has stated the precise effect of the amendment if adopted. That is just what I intended to do by the amendment should it be adopted. This bill is modeled on the bill of my State, probably the most perfect bankrupt bill in the country, and that bill requires the payment of fifty cents on the dollar or the assent of a majority in number and amount of the creditors before the bankrupt can be discharged. I think the experience of twenty-five or thirty years shows that that law operates well, and that there is very little difficulty in a bankrupt getting discharged under it in a proper case. If it extended over the whole country I think we should have an excellent system. While this bill, if it shall pass, will relieve a great many excellent men who ought to be relieved and whom I shall be glad to see relieved, we shall have a great deal of dishonesty enacted under it, and there will be a great deal of fault found and complaints made, as there were at the time we passed the bankrupt bill in 1841 or 1842. I think if we pass this bill with the amendment I propose all persons in the country who ought to be discharged will find no great difficulty in making settlements with their creditors. I do not know what others will do; I simply want to vote for it myself. I believe it to be sound policy.

Mr. HARRIS. The proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts is a very ingenious mode of entirely defeating this measure. No honest man could get a discharge under this law if the amendment should prevail. How is it? An honest man devotes his property so far as it will go toward the payment of his debts in the first place. He then finds a balance of indebtedness which he has no means of paying. The proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts is, that in addition to the devotion of his property to the payment of his debts he shall pay fifty per cent. of the balance of the debts, when probably he has not a dollar to devote to that purpose. No honest man can get a discharge under the law if the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts prevails; it defeats the bill.

Mr. WILSON. I will simply say that after twenty-five years' experience in an agricultural, mechanical, and commercial State, where there is a great deal of indebtedness, we find that the system works admirably, and honest men experience no great difficulty under it. I do not know what the Senate intends to do; but I shall vote that way myself. I have great doubts about the propriety of passing this bill, especially at this time, and with the limitations we have got upon it. I see very plainly that a man may be a man of fortune and yet not be compelled to pay his debts. I expect it will be so construed that the stay laws which have recently been passed in some States to enable men to retain their property, so that their creditors can obtain nothing from them will be included under this bill, and their creditors may whistle for their claims.

Mr. POLAND. I suppose there will be a great many dishonest men in the world whether this bankrupt law is passed or not. There are a great many men in the world who evade the payment of their debts now. I know no reason why we may not have as ample and as sharp machinery in a bankrupt law to compel dishonest debtors to disgorge as in any other law. The provisions of this bill are exceedingly sharp in relation to the means furnished for ascertaining the truth in that respect; and if my friend, the Senator from Massachusetts, can devise anything more stringent, anything that will be more available, he is perfectly welcome to have it put into the bill. It is drawn with very great care in that respect. If my friend has any fears in relation to the stay laws of the southern States I shall be perfectly willing for one to vote for an express amendment that shall prevent their being included.

In relation to what the Senator says as to the exemption that has been made, that a man may have the benefit of this law and still be a wealthy man, have a large amount of property, I will only remark that the provisions of this bill do not allow any debtor to retain any greater amount of property or any different property from what, by the laws of the several States, he is now entitled to retain. It exempts nothing from the reach of the creditors except what is exempt now by law. We have not increased the amount of exemption at all, or allowed a debtor to retain anything against his creditors except what is now protected by law from his creditors under any process of the law now known.

Mr. WILSON. I wish the Senator from Vermont had given us his deliberate opinion whether those stay laws will be under this bill protected. I should be very glad to hear his opinion upon that point.

Mr. POLAND. I am very willing to give my opinion to the Senator. I think those stay laws are unconstitutional and void, and that nothing in this bill covers them or protects them or makes them valid.

Mr. WILSON. Well, if the bill is to pass, and I suppose it is from indications about us, we shall see what will be the result. I have always been in favor of a bankrupt law well guarded, taking care of the creditor and the debtor alike, doing justice to both, although I have thought that until matters were settled and the creditors had an opportunity to collect something of the millions of indebtedness due them from the rebel regions of the country, it would not be wise to pass such a bill. I had hoped that before this time some progress would have been made in the settlement of these vast claims from that section of the country. Instead of that, however, they have been recently passing stay laws and exemption laws.

It seems to me that we ought to have in this bill something that shall set aside those laws, something by which persons may not roll in wealth themselves while their creditors are starving, for I know to-day many a man who is toiling and supporting his family by wages, while others have his earnings for years in their pockets and are living in idleness.

Now, sir, I do not wish to legislate either for the debtor or the creditor in this matter. I wish all honest debtors to pay over what property they have got and get their discharge; but under this bill, as it now stands, men may own in several of the States a large amount of property, and yet hold it in such a way that poor laboring men, men who have labored for them for wages, men who are struggling to obtain a livelihood, cannot get from them what is honestly their due. If this bill was only to operate in the future I would not care anything about the exemptions, for, believing as I do sincerely, after much reflection upon the subject, that nine tenths of the credits in this country are injurious and demoralizing to the people of the country, I should be perfectly willing that every person who credits another should rely entirely upon the integrity and personal character of the person to whom he gives the credit. But it is not so; there are tens of thousands of men in the country who in the past have been embarrassed.

We all want to relieve them. I should be glad to see every honest man among them relieved, and I should also be glad to see those who have property covered, hid away, or protected by any exemption laws give up that property and pay their debts, except a reasonable amount to be retained by their families.

I shall vote for the amendment, because I believe one of the oldest, if not the oldest and best bankrupt law in the United States, from which this bankrupt bill has been drawn substantially, has that provision in it, and there it works well, and our experience justifies us, I think, in putting it into this bill.

Mr. STEWART. The adoption of this amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, of course, is the end of the bill. There will be no bankrupt bill if you now provide that no debtor shall be a discharged bankrupt unless his assets are sufficient to pay fifty per cent. of the claims against his estate. And now I should like to say a word in regard to one remark made by the Senator from Massachusetts in support of this amendment. He says that it is objectionable to pass this bill at this time, because there is a large amount of indebtedness due by persons in the South, payment of which has been postponed in consequence of the rebellion, which will be lost to northern creditors if this bill be passed. I think he is entirely mistaken as to the practical operation of this bill so far as that matter is concerned.

In the first place, the theory of a bankrupt bill is, that when a man is hopelessly insolvent it is better for the creditor that he should be discharged, so that he need not send good money after bad, and it is better for the community that the debtor should be discharged, so that he may be of use to the community. If a man, whether in the South or in the North, is hopelessly insolvent, I would not wish to tax the creditor by putting him to the expense of attempting to collect anything.

A word further in respect to the operation of this bill in the South. Gentlemen complain of stay laws, and I admit they are onerous and wrong. This bill sweeps out of existence the stay laws. If a southern debtor has property and is willing to avail himself of stay laws or of the prejudices of the community which would prevent a fair verdict by a jury in a suit for the recovery of a northern debt, this bill enables the creditor to force him into bankruptcy, to compel a distribution of his assets, and this through the process of the United States courts, whereas the State courts there as now organized are very poor machinery for the collection of debts.

Then I say that where the debtor is hopelessly insolvent it is better for the northern creditor that he should know it, and the less money he sends after what is lost the better; and where the debtor is not insolvent, but wishes to shield behind stay laws or to avail himself of a prejudice that exists in the community, so as to affect juries or interrupt the due administration of justice, this bill enables the creditors to go into the United States courts and coerce the debtor into bankruptcy and have a fair distribution of the assets. So far as the northern debtor is concerned it is much better that he should have a settlement. This bill enables him to get a settlement in any event. If he can get nothing he knows it; if there is anything to be distributed it enables him to reach the debtor who is attempting to evade payment. Really it is some relief to the northern creditor.

Then, throughout the North values have changed so rapidly in the last six years, men's property has fluctuated to such an extent, that there is a large number of persons who are insolvent, with large indebtedness hanging over them, which is merely the result of the fluctuation in prices, and which no human foresight could have guarded against. It is highly important that they should be relieved. The community demands their services in the avenues of business. If there ever was a time when a bankrupt bill was appropriate it seems to me now is the time.

Furthermore, we should have such a law on our statute-book as a regular system for all time. All civilized nations recognize the importance of this. A bankrupt bill holds up a moral standard for traders that does not exist independently of it. If a trader commits an act of fraud, an act of bankruptcy, he can be driven into bankruptcy, although he may have a large surplus above what is sufficient to pay his debts. Such a law fixes a standard of morality which is higher than is recognized by the insolvent laws of the different States. It is a compulsory as well as a voluntary system of bankruptcy. Most of the States have their insolvent laws, but they are not as good for the general creditor throughout the United States as this bankrupt law would be. The insolvent laws in most of the southern States enable a debtor to much more easily prevent his property being fairly distributed among his creditors than this bill. You cannot wipe out the insolvent laws that exist in the South. The States all over the Union have insolvent laws, and under those laws there is no possibility of a creditor non-resident in the State getting a portion of the proceeds when there is a distribution. That was the evil aimed at by the framers of the Constitution when they gave Congress power to pass a uniform bankrupt law, as the debates show, because the States were passing bankrupt and insolvent laws that gave a preference to resident over non-resident creditors. There was an evil in that respect, and that was the very evil intended to be removed by giving this power to Congress. The evil still exists, however.

I say, then, this bill, as a measure in favor of creditors, and of northern creditors if you please, is of some advantage to them. It gives them a remedy which they do not now have, and takes away from them no right which they now have. Anything that can be done to avoid the payment of a debt can be much more readily done under the State insolvent laws that exist throughout the South.

I hope the bill will become a law; but if this amendment prevails it is the end of the bill.

Mr. WILSON. Why does the Senator say that it is the end of the bill? I should like to know why he makes that particular remark. I do not so understand it. We can pass the bill afterward, and the bill will be effective. I do not see anything that justifies the Senator in making that declaration. If he means to say that some persons cannot be cleared of their debts, relieved of their obligations, if we pass the bill in this form, it is a fair declaration; but the bill, in my judgment, is a much better bill with the amendment than it is without it.

Mr. STEWART. I will explain why it is the end of the bill. Here is one man who is a rascal, who has committed all the acts of bankruptcy that are possible, who has concealed his property, and has defrauded his creditors in every possible way. Under the amendment the creditors cannot drive that man into bankruptcy unless they can show that they can make fifty per cent. out of his assets. If he has got his property hid so that the assets available will not pay fifty per cent. of his debts, the creditors cannot drive him into bankruptcy. He will be able to say to them, "Although I have committed innumerable frauds, although I ought to be hung, perhaps, for the frauds I have committed, still I have not got property which can be got hold of to divide fifty per cent. among my creditors, and therefore you cannot force me into bankruptcy." Is that right?

Mr. WILSON. This bill was drawn by an eminent member of the House of Representatives, and passed by the House of Representatives, and they propose precisely the same thing at the end of a year. I propose to begin now and require the debtor to pay fifty cents on the dollar, or obtain a majority in number and amount of the creditors before he can be discharged. There is no end to the bill by adopting the amendment. The bill is just as good a bill, and in my judgment a much better and safer one for us to pass, with the amendment than without it; and after we put it in operation, if modifications be needed they can be made. In my judgment, if this bill passes as it stands you will find thousands of men over this country who have concealed property, who have cheated creditors, rushing forward first to obtain relief under it, as was the case under the old bankrupt law, and you will find a great outcry against it.

Now, sir, I believe that if the well-settled system existing in my State, and which has existed there for a quarter of a century, containing the provision which I have here moved, which works admirably, and under which hardly any man fails to obtain his discharge, is incorporated into this bill, its operation will be better and more satisfactory, and will work out greater results of justice than it will in this manner. I shall therefore vote for the amendment.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator from Massachusetts the other day in debate enlightened us as to the paternity of a bill which was then under consideration. Now, I should like to know of him whether or not he regards this as a western measure.

Mr. WILSON. No, sir. I do not think it is a measure that the agricultural, laboring, and mechanical interests generally take a great deal of concern in. It is a commercial bill. I believe a good bankrupt bill ought always to exist. I think that it was a great mistake that the old bill, after it had done all the evil it could do, was not properly amended according to the experience of the country and then continued in force. If that had been done we should now have a good bankrupt bill in the country. We ought to have such a bill, and I move this amendment for that purpose. This I know is a commercial measure, a measure for protecting the business men of the country more than the agricultural and mechanical interests.

Mr. JOHNSON. If I understand the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, it is that no party shall have the benefit of the bankrupt act who is now actually bankrupt, unless he shall be able to show assets to the amount of fifty cents on the dollar upon his whole indebtedness. The effect of that amendment, as I think the honorable member will see when he reflects more maturely upon it, would be to deprive of the benefit of this law perhaps nearly half, if not more, of those who stand very much in need of this relief. The honorable member tells us that a provision of the same kind is found in the insolvent laws of Massachusetts. I suppose in that he is right; and as these laws have been in force for many years as far as relates to all who could be benefited by a discharge under those laws, he thinks the amendment which he proposes would have no deleterious operation. But the honorable member knows that the Supreme Court have decided, and that is considered now as the settled doctrine on the subject, that the insolvent laws of the States have no operation to free the citizens of those States from the obligation to pay any debts which they may owe to the citizens of other States. And the result is that even the people of Massachusetts who may be unfortunately bankrupt, as well as the people of the other States who are in that situation, are not now, and have not been since the repeal of the last bankrupt act, able to free themselves from the embarrassments of their debts. In the absence of the bankrupt law, therefore, those debtors who are honest (for the law is intended only to apply to them) have exhausted all their assets, and they could not be relieved from their debts by surrendering what they had at the moment they ascertained they became bankrupt; there being no law in force by which they could be relieved to that extent, they have lived on hoping often against hope until they are without anything.

And independent of that, the civil troubles to which we have been subjected, and which have more or less had an effect upon commercial men, and upon all other men, have been such as at once in many cases to sweep away from them all their assets so that they are hopelessly insolvent. Now, all that the House proposed was to require a debtor to show assets to the amount of fifty cents on the dollar who may apply for the benefit of this statute after the expiration of a certain period, I think, and not from the passage of the act. The object of that provision is very apparent. If at the time of the passage of the act, when he can be relieved, he is in the possession of assets which would go to discharge in whole or in part his debts, although he finds that he may not be able to go on so as to save anything for himself after discharging his debts, and he refuses to apply until he has exhausted all his assets, there may be some reason in requiring of him the possession of assets to the extent of fifty cents on the dollar, or any other amount before he shall have the benefit of this law; but what is to become of the almost innumerable number of men who are now unable to pay their debts and unable to show any assets? The honorable member cannot, I am sure, fail to be aware that whatever may be the condition of Massachusetts debtors or Massachusetts men in the South, whatever their condition was before the war commenced, every thing has been swept away. I suppose there is no debtor in the South who would be able to show assets to the amount of fifty cents on the dollar if he was in debt any amount. Those who have been trading with Massachusetts and trading with the other Atlantic States in mercantile business have had taken from them, by means of the war, in consequence of the war, all the assets they had. One of the objects of this bill is to provide for that class of citizens as well as to provide for the class of citizens who have become unfortunately bankrupt in our own States.

The view of the committee, however, was that, looking to the purpose of an act of this description, looking to what we supposed was the policy that ought to be pursued in reference to such cases, it was not advisable to include in the law any such limitation. I know it may be said that it is one of the means by which frauds to any extent may be prevented. But no party is entitled to the benefit of this act unless he can show that he has been perfectly innocent of all fraud. The objection to the provision is as it came from the House, and it applies with still more force to the amendment of that provision suggested by the honorable member from Massachusetts, that it makes the absence of assets to the extent of fifty cents on the dollar conclusive evidence against the debtor. Why should that be so? How many of the merchants of the land and the business men of the country, to say nothing of the South, from time to time have embarked in enterprises depending for their success upon the honesty of others, an amount which if lost would reduce their assets to less than fifty cents on the dollar? Are they to be denied the privilege of the law? Are they to be stricken down hopelessly, having no means at all of laboring successfully for the support even of their own families, and still less of laboring so as to increase the wealth of the country? It will be so if this passes; and the committee were of opinion—and in that opinion, I believe I may say, if it is proper to refer to such a subject at all, there was perfect unanimity—that it was a sufficient guard against any improper appropriation of assets after an act of bankruptcy committed or after the fact of bankruptcy became known to the debtor, to provide that he should not be entitled to a discharge unless he was able to show that he had acted fairly. Innocent mistake we thought ought not to involve him in hopeless misery, to use a term not at all too strong for the condition in which a hopeless bankrupt is placed, with his wife and children around him, dependent not only for education, but even for maintenance upon his being able to provide the means by which both are to be obtained or acquired. We thought—and in that particular we acted in accordance with nearly all the laws to be found on the continent of Europe and in England—that innocent bankruptcy was no crime, and that in the absence of crime it was fit and proper that every man should be made a freeman absolute, a freeman discharged from the thralldom of debt, a freeman discharged from the thralldom of laws which enforced may make a slave of a freeman.

The honorable member from Massachusetts and others who are upon this floor—and in that opinion I concurred—thought that the institution of human slavery was abhorrent, not only to all ideas of justice, but to all ideas of humanity, and that it should be at once put an end to. They thought evidently the other day, as that opinion was indicated in the debates, that the laws to be found in the statutes of some of the States authorizing the sale, even for crime, of any individual, were abhorrent to all the modern notions of humanity. And yet, Mr. President, can any one imagine a slavery more absolute and more heart-rending, a slavery that more effectually strikes at human energy, than that which, although not existing in the walls of a penitentiary or of a jail, a man sees in his own household in the utter hopelessness with which his wife and his children from day to day live, with no expectation of being relieved from the slavery of debt in the absence of a law of this description? And all that the law proposes is, that he who is in that condition of human thralldom shall be permitted to escape from it and be again a man, if he has innocently been brought to that condition.

I hope, Mr. President, the amendment will not prevail, and that the bill as it came from the House in that particular section will be altered by striking out the clause which the committee have moved to strike out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Edmunds in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Wilson] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment. After the word "and" in line ten of the clause proposed to be stricken out I move to strike out all the residue of the words of that clause and to insert in lieu of them these words:

Provided, That no person who files a petition asking to be declared a bankrupt, or who may file any pleading in court, or give his consent on the record to the judgment or order of the court declaring him to be a bankrupt, shall have a discharge from his debts, until a majority, both in number and amount of debt, of his creditors shall give their assent thereto by some pleading or other paper filed, by order of the court or upon the record.

I will say a word in explanation of my amendment to the amendment. The object of my proposition is to discriminate between voluntary and involuntary bankruptcy. The effect of my amendment, if adopted, will be to leave the provisions and principles of the bill as reported by the committee to apply to all cases of involuntary bankruptcy, and to establish a different rule in relation to all cases of voluntary bankruptcy. My own judgment would be that where a man is declared a bankrupt against his will he is made an involuntary bankrupt: where his property is wrested from him and distributed among his creditors, if he makes a fair and full surrender, he ought to be entitled to his discharge. But in that other and more recent class of cases of bankruptcy, voluntary bankruptcy, I want to establish a different rule.

I have always doubted myself whether the framers of the Constitution intended to allow any other class of bankruptcy than involuntary bankruptcy; but the act of 1841 established a different principle, and created voluntary as well as involuntary bankruptcy, and I suppose that the law of 1841, and its acquiescence in by the country, has probably settled forever the principle that bankruptcy may be voluntary as well as involuntary. But I know the abuses to which the law of 1841 was made subservient. Hundreds of thousands of men that owed but a small amount of debt, in my own State many who owed debts under $500 and as low as $200, filed their petitions to be declared bankrupts, and were so adjudged and received their discharge. If these men, owing but a small amount of debts, had with energy and frugality and industry gone to work they could in a very short time have made money enough to liquidate and discharge all their debts; but they fraudulently preferred the mode of liquidation by bankruptcy sooner than by labor and economy.

Now, sir, I suppose you cannot by any system or by any regulations which may be adopted, define and eviscerate clearly and infallibly the cases of voluntary and involuntary bankruptcy. In many cases where the purpose seems apparently to be to declare a debtor a bankrupt against his will, it may, and no doubt often will be with his full consent and concurrence. But so far as that point can be ascertained and made certain, my wish and the principle of my proposition is simply that in cases of voluntary bankruptcy the bankrupt shall not have his discharge until a majority of his creditors, both in number and amount, give their assent upon the record to his discharge. I believe that that principle would work very inconsiderable, if any, injustice, because I doubt not that in every case even of voluntary bankruptcy where a bankrupt ought to have his discharge from his debts he would be able to obtain the consent of a majority of his creditors, both in number and amount; and my proposition is simply to guard against fraud committed under this bill by persons who voluntarily seek bankruptcy.

Mr. POLAND. I do not design upon these amendments to enter into any discussion about the general merits of a bankrupt law. The principle upon which this bill goes is, that a debtor who is unable to pay his debts and who surrenders all his property is entitled by law to have a discharge. The simple question is, whether we will say that the principle of this law is to be entirely thrown aside, and declare that whether a man shall have a discharge or not shall depend upon the consent of the creditors. If we require that we may as well not have any bankrupt law.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not think the proposition I make interferes with the general principle of the bill. I agree as a general proposition both of humanity and of policy that where a debtor is unable to pay his debts and he is forced into bankruptcy against his will, or, if you pleased, without his concurrence, and he is compelled to surrender his property to his creditors, he ought to have his discharge. The proposition which I make does not apply to that class of cases at all. It applies only to cases where the application is in form, as well as in substance, in the name of the debtor himself to be declared a bankrupt, and in all such cases that the debtor where he seeks himself to be declared a bankrupt shall not have the privilege of canceling his debts by a judgment against him in bankruptcy unless that judgment is concurred in by a majority of his creditors both in number and in amount.

In every case in which the proceeding is instituted by a creditor and not by the debtor himself, the general principle of the act would be left to apply, and the debtor would be allowed to have the benefit of his free and full discharge. It would only be in case where the proceeding was instituted formally by the debtor himself and not by his creditors, and where the presumption might arise that it was a fraud and speculation on his part to get a discharge from his debts under the forms of this proceeding by his own movement, and not by the movement of his creditors—it would only be in that class of cases that the consent of a majority of the creditors in number and amount would be required under my amendment. Indeed, I am not certain that it would not be a salutary principle, one that would be promotive of justice and not at all inhumane in its operation, to require such a consent of creditors in every case of bankruptcy, whether it be voluntary or involuntary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. EDMUNDS.) The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question again recurs on the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HOWARD. Let it be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to strike out all of section thirty-three after the word "otherwise" in line ten, in the following words:

And in all proceedings in bankruptcy commenced after one year from the time this act shall go into operation, no discharge shall be granted to a debtor whose assets do not pay fifty per cent. of the claims against his estate, unless the assent in writing of a majority in number and value of his creditors who have proved their claims is filed in the case at or before the time of application for discharge.

Mr. HOWARD. I was not in my seat when the pending amendment was first stated, but I can see no reason for making such a distinction as this. I think it is unfounded. I can see no justice in it; I hope, therefore, it will be stricken out. I will not detain the Senate, however, at this time with any further remarks. The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line fifteen of section thirty-four to strike out "two years" and insert "one year;" so as to make the proviso to that section read:

Always provided, That any creditor or creditors of said bankrupt, whose debt was proved or provable against the estate in bankruptcy, who shall see fit to contest the validity of said discharge on the ground that it was fraudulently obtained, may, at any time within one year after the date thereof, apply to the court which granted it to set aside and annul the same.

Mr. POLAND. It is just perhaps that I should make some little explanation in reference to this amendment. Under the bankrupt law of 1841, whenever a bankrupt pleaded his discharge in bankruptcy when sued for any debt that had accrued prior to the discharge, the creditor was at liberty upon the trial to come in and impeach the discharge. When the discharge was set up and pleaded as a defense to an action against a bankrupt the creditor was authorized to come in and answer that discharge by showing that there was some fraud in the proceedings of the bankrupt, that his property was not all surrendered, that there were almost any violations of the requirements of the bankrupt law. By this bill the discharge is made final and conclusive. The discharge when pleaded by the bankrupt to an action is not allowed to be impeached in that collateral way. But the creditor is authorized to apply to the court which granted the discharge to have the discharge itself set aside. If the creditor discovers that the bankrupt has been guilty of any concealment of his property, or for any reason was not entitled to the discharge, he might have appeared before the court and objected to the court's giving the discharge, and he may again apply to the court after the discharge has been given to have the discharge itself annulled or set aside.

Mr. HOWE. Within what time?

Mr. POLAND. The bill as it passed the House gave the creditor two years for that purpose. The amendment proposed by the committee restricts it to one year. I do not desire to discuss the relative merits of the respective times, one year or two years; but the effect of this amendment is to reduce the time from two years as the House fixed it to one year.

Mr. HOWE. I decidedly like the amendment reported by the committee. I think effect should be given to this judgment of the court in bankruptcy some time or other. I think it should take effect at least in a year. That is time enough, it seems to me, given to any creditor who did not appear on the hearing to move for a rehearing, which I understand this to be in effect. The very object of the bill is to enable insolvent debtors to procure a discharge from their indebtedness, and they ought to be able to know whether they are discharged or not in some reasonable time. To require them to go through all the steps preliminary to a hearing, give all the notices, cite all the creditors, have the hearing, obtain the decree, and then be compelled to wait two years to know whether that decree is worth anything or not seems to me to be a very great hardship.

I believe a year is as long as is allowed any party to move for a rehearing on a new trial in ordinary proceedings. To allow so long a time as two years goes very far to defeat the whole purpose of the bill. It is said that there is a great urgent public necessity for unfettering a vast amount of business talent and ability that is now tied up by indebtedness. If you want to unfetter it do so. There is no object in merely changing the fetters. Do it in the course of their lives. They will be unfettered in the course of time at some time or other, and the great majority of them, I am inclined to think, before they would be by the force of this bill if that time is extended to two years. I hope the Senate will agree to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HOWARD. After the proceeding has been finished, resulting in the granting of a discharge to the bankrupt, which is a formal paper issued by the court under its seal to discharge him from his debts, there is a privilege given to creditors to contest the validity of the discharge. Otherwise, I suppose, that the bankrupt's discharge would be binding and conclusive upon all creditors, and would prevent them forever from questioning the validity of the discharge upon the ground of fraud. There are numerous causes which creditors may allege by way of setting aside the discharge and having it canceled. The bill itself spreads out before us this field of objections. I read from page 42 of the bill:

No discharge shall be granted, or, if granted, be valid, if the bankrupt has willfully sworn falsely in his affidavit annexed to his petition, schedule, or inventory, or upon any examination in the course of the proceedings in bankruptcy, in relation to any material fact concerning his estate or his debts, or to any other material fact; or if he has concealed any part of his estate or effects, or any books or writings relating thereto, or if he has been guilty of any fraud or negligence in the care, custody, or delivery to the assignee of the property belonging to him at the time of the presentation of his petition and inventory, excepting such property as he is permitted to retain under the provisions of this act, or if he has caused, permitted, or suffered any loss, waste, or destruction thereof; or if, within four months before the commencement of such proceedings, he has procured his lands, goods, money, or chattels to be attached, sequestered, or seized on execution; or if, since the passage of this act, he has destroyed, mutilated, altered, or falsified any of his books, documents, papers, writings, or securities, or has made or been privy to the making of any false or fraudulent entry in any book of account or other document, with intent to defraud his creditors; or has removed or caused to be removed any part of his property from the district with intent to defraud his creditors; or if he has given any fraudulent preference contrary to the provisions of this act, or made any fraudulent payment, gift, transfer, conveyance, or assignment of any part of his property, or has lost any part thereof in gaming, or has admitted a false or fictitious debt against his estate; or if, having knowledge that any person has proved such false or fictitious debt, he has not disclosed the same to his assignee within one month after such knowledge; or if, being a merchant or tradesman, he has not, subsequently to the passage of this act, kept proper books of account; or if he, or any person in his behalf, has procured the assent of any creditor to the discharge, or influenced the action of any creditor at any stage of the proceedings, by any pecuniary consideration or obligation; or if he has, in contemplation of becoming bankrupt, made any pledge, payment, transfer, assignment, or conveyance of any part of his property, directly or indirectly, absolutely or conditionally, for the purpose of preferring any creditor or person having a claim against him, or who is or may be under liability for him, or for the purpose of preventing the property from coming into the hands of the assignee, or of being distributed under this act in satisfaction of his debts; or if he has been convicted of any misdemeanor under this act, &c.

There is a vast number of causes which may be alleged by the creditors against the validity of the discharge, and these causes cover almost every transaction connected with the bankrupt's estate, the entries in his own books, and a thousand other matters, which it will be very difficult for the creditors or any one of them for a considerable length of time to develop and expose. The policy of the bill, as it passed the House of Representatives, was to allow a reasonable time for making the necessary inquiries, with a view to contest the validity of the discharge, and they fixed the time at two years within which this was to be done. I think that time is quite short enough for the benefit of the creditor. The great creditor classes of this country reside chiefly at the East and in eastern cities. It is not to be presumed that they or their attorneys can within any very short time make a full and thorough investigation into the condition of the affairs of a bankrupt who lives at a distant place in the far West; and the same may be said of every section of the country. Non-resident creditors, whose claims and rights are as dear to them as to any other class of men, certainly ought to be allowed a reasonable length of time to contest the validity of the discharge, and to show the court that the discharge was based upon falsehood or upon fraud; and it seems to me that one year is quite too short a time within which to confine the inquiries of the creditors.

I hope, therefore, that two years will be retained. I do not remember what the fact was in relation to the act of 1841, whether the time was one year or two years.

Mr. POLAND. By the act of 1841 it was not necessary that the creditor should apply to get the discharge set aside. He could contest it wherever it was set up as a defense.

Mr. HOWARD. He could contest it at any time?

Mr. POLAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOWARD. I believe such was the law. There was no limit as to the time within which this contestation could be made. The creditor could at any time within twenty years contest the validity of the discharge upon the ground of fraud. Here the committee propose to limit this contestation to one year from the time of the discharge. I think that is entirely too short. If a bankrupt has been honest and truthful in his proceedings in bankruptcy and has obtained a discharge honestly and fairly, he has nothing to fear during the short period of two years that should embarrass him in reëntering into any commercial business. On the other hand, if he has been guilty of fraud or falsehood in procuring his discharge, two years is a period quite short enough within which to allow the creditors to contest that discharge and show the fraud and falsehood. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

The question being put on the amendment,

Mr. HOWE called for a division; and the ayes were—6, and the noes 19; no quorum voting.

Mr. HOWE. I give it up: I withdraw the call for a division.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no quorum present and voting.

Mr. POLAND. I think if the question be put again it will be shown that there is a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair ascertains by actual count that a quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. HOWE. I do not insist upon a further division.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment, then, will stand as disagreed to. The next amendment of the committee will be reported. The Secretary read the next amendment, which was in section thirty-four, line thirty, to strike out the words "and true" after "proved."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section thirty-six, to strike out the words "and not true," after "not proved," in line thirty-five.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section forty-seven, to strike out the words "of the salaries," and insert "for the services."

Mr. POLAND. As the bill was originally drawn, the registers had a salary given them. As the bill now stands they are paid by fees, so that this becomes a mere necessary verbal alteration.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line fifty, of section forty-seven, to strike out "commissioners" and insert "judges."

Mr. POLAND. That is necessary in consequence of an amendment already adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments reported by the committee have been gone through with. The bill is still open to amendment.

Mr. POLAND. Section forty-nine confers jurisdiction under this act upon "the supreme court of the United States for the District of Columbia." I believe there is no such court. I move that the words "United States for" be stricken out, so as to read "the supreme court of the District of Columbia," which I believe is the name of the local court here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That correction will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. POLAND. In the next line jurisdiction is conferred upon "the district courts of the several Territories." The local name of these territorial courts is supreme courts. I move, therefore, to strike out the word "district" and insert "supreme."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That change will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I propose the following amendment, to come in at the end of the last section of the bill:

And provided further, That no proceedings in voluntary bankruptcy under this act shall dissolve or affect the obligation of any existing contract or indebtedness.

Mr. POLAND. Perhaps we ought to understand the importance of this amendment and not let it pass in silence. I hardly understand the amendment myself; but if I have anything like a correct understanding of it, it provides that this bill shall be prospective merely; have no effect upon existing debts and contracts. That is a pretty important principle. I do not desire myself to enter into the discussion of it at all. Twenty-five years ago, when the bankrupt law was passed in 1841, this subject was discussed at very great length and with very great ability at two or three several sessions of Congress before the bill was finally passed, and at the session when it was finally repealed. It was claimed, with great emphasis and earnestness at least, that a bankrupt bill of this sort would be unconstitutional; that we had no right to make it apply to existing debts; but it was determined otherwise by Congress in the passage of that bill, and that principle was universally sustained by the courts everywhere, so that it is no longer open to this objection of unconstitutionality.

As to the question of expediency, it seems to me there can be no doubt about it. If we are to have a bankrupt law at all, is it not just as necessary that men who are now laboring under a mass of debt that they cannot pay should be discharged as that men should be discharged from debts that accrue hereafter? The question of constitutionality having been settled beyond all question or cavil by the thousand judicial decisions that were made under the bankrupt law of 1841, it seems to me that difficulty is entirely removed. And as to its expediency, as to the rightfulness of it, as to the propriety of the thing itself, there can be no question in the mind of any man.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not propose to make any speech in support of this amendment. I am opposed to the enactment of any bankrupt law made applicable to existing indebtedness. I would support a bankrupt law to operate prospectively, so that every man who makes a contract can make it in reference to a bankrupt law in existence. Without undertaking to say whether this part of the law which this amendment is intended to affect is constitutional or unconstitutional, I do not believe in the justice of any such legislation. And as to the necessity of the retrospective effect of this law, I disagree very much with the honorable Senator from Vermont. According to the information I have, there never has been a time in the history of this country when there was so little necessity for a bankrupt law as at this time; no time when the people were so generally free from debt in the United States as they are at this time.

Mr. POLAND. Then it will not do any harm to make it retrospective.

Mr. WILLIAMS. For that reason there is no pressing necessity, as it seems, for a bankrupt law to operate upon existing indebtedness. Doubtless there are very many persons who will be greatly injured by the enactment of this law. I am convinced that if the law is enacted in its present shape its history will be very much like the history of the other bankrupt law: just as soon as an opportunity is afforded, all the dishonest debtors of the country will avail themselves of the advantages of the law, and all those who are honest and endeavoring to struggle along and pay their debts will be deprived of its advantages; and the conduct of the dishonest debtors will make the law so odious that it will be repealed, and the other was, in a very short time, and the real benefits of the law will in that way be wholly defeated.

I do not see why a prospective bankrupt law could not be enacted. I believe that was the intentment of the men who made the Constitution, that a bankrupt law should be made to operate in futuro, that all legislation should be such as to enable men when they make a contract to know what the obligation and effect of the contract is. I hope, sir, that this amendment will be adopted. I ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. In the consideration of this bankrupt bill I have felt disposed to follow the committee in all their amendments, so that if we are to have a bankrupt law we shall have one that has been carefully matured, carefully considered, and well guarded to carry out the intention of the framers of the law. It is manifest that the amendment of the Senator from Oregon is totally inconsistent with the great body of the bill. If adopted, it is a virtual defeat of the bill. The adoption of this amendment will require of course the recommitment of the bill. I prefer to defeat the bill by a direct vote rather than do it by indirection. I think the gentleman who has charge of this bill will admit that if this amendment be adopted the whole bill must be re-framed. The bill has been framed mainly to apply to preëxisting debts, and this clause is entirely inconsistent with many sections of the bill, so that it would not be fair to vote in favor of this amendment unless you want to defeat the bill by indirection.

My own course as to this bankrupt bill will be decided somewhat by the plain and obvious public opinion of the State of Ohio. In the State of Ohio there is a strong prejudice against a bankrupt bill. A part of that grows out of the fact that it is an agricultural community, and bankrupt laws are not favored by agricultural and mechanical communities. They are commercial measures; and they are only justified by the fluctuations and losses in commercial transactions. They are the growth of the English system of commerce, and generally an agricultural community have a strong prejudice against a bankrupt law. A part of this prejudice in this case has grown out of the abuses of the law of 1841, when men apparently wealthy suddenly took the benefit of the bankrupt law, discharged themselves from all their liabilities, and soon after became rich again, and sometimes honest creditors saw the debtors who had been discharged by the bankrupt law rolling in wealth, while they themselves in some cases were suffering the pangs of poverty. The remembrance of that transaction, which was before my time, undoubtedly prejudices the public mind against a bankrupt law.

But rather than that I have the best evidence that the public sentiment of the State of Ohio is against it from the action of the Legislature two years ago when this very bill, or one similar in character, was introduced into Congress. The Legislature of Ohio with great unanimity then instructed the Senators from that State to vote against it. While I do not feel bound by legislative instructions, while I do not regard myself as compelled to obey the wishes of the Legislature if inconsistent with the duty which I owe to myself and my position, I yet pay great respect to the views of the Legislature as an evidence of the public sentiment of the State; and I always do respect that expression, especially when I am convinced that the Legislature expresses the sentiments of the people of the State, as is the case on this matter. I shall feel bound, therefore, to vote against this bill; but in doing so I am desirous to promote all proper amendments to the bill and to see it consistent, so that if passed against my own judgment it may be a bill creditable and uniform and consistent throughout.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator if he feels bound to vote against a bill operating prospectively? Suppose this amendment should be adopted and the bill should be recommitted to the committee and they should prepare a bill in accordance with the instructions which the adoption of this amendment would involve, would he feel bound to vote against it?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it would be better at once to recommit the bill. It would not be fair to defeat it in this way. If the amendment were adopted, as a matter of course the gentleman having charge of the bill would at once move its recommitment. If the Senator desires to recommit it on the ground that he will not vote for anything but a prospective bill, he had better make a motion to recommit expressly with those instructions.

I might say that there is another opposition to this bill from the commercial cities—Cincinnati for example. Most of the letters I receive, in regard to this bill, are either from persons who desire to avail themselves of its benefits or persons in Cincinnati who are creditors. They claim that, by this bill, their debtors in the southern States will be discharged—that the property of the southern States, now greatly reduced in value, will be thrown suddenly upon the market by bankrupts, and that they will be paid off with nothing; that they are substantially excluded by public opinion from becoming purchasers of property in the southern States, and that there is great danger that they may lose all chance of recovering their debts if this bill becomes a law. Now they are able, by compromises and by adjustments, to get some portion of their debts, but their impression is that if this law passes, which must be uniform in its operation, the little property that is in the hands of their debtors in the South will be suddenly thrown into the market and sold at the present depreciated prices, and they defeated in the collection of their debts.

These considerations will induce me to vote against the bill on its passage. At the same time I shall vote against any amendment that would embarrass the bill or make it inconsistent with itself.

Mr. POLAND. What has been said by the honorable Senator from Ohio in reference to the objections to this bill, and especially those growing out of the fact of the indebtedness of the South to the North, has not very much connection with this amendment that is moved by the Senator from Oregon.

Now, Mr. President, in consequence of the fact of my having been the organ of the Judiciary Committee to report this bill to the Senate at the last session, I have been made the object, the victim almost, of an immense correspondence upon the subject of this bankrupt law; and so far as I have been able to discover who are the most anxious and the most desirous for the passage of this bankrupt bill, it is northern creditors of southern debtors. With the single exception of one gentleman in Philadelphia, who has got a southern debt that he fears he will lose, the universal expression to me of all that class of persons, so far as I have any knowledge of it, has been that their only chance of getting pay from southern debtors was by the passage of a bankrupt law.

They say that the property in the South is almost entirely in land; it is owned in large quantities, large tracts by persons who are largely in debt; that the owners of this land are the persons who control the State legislation and the State courts; they are the persons whose influence procures the stay laws; they are the persons who control in reference to the State courts the sentiments, judgments, and opinions of those courts. They say that the only chance for them to collect anything off their southern debtors is to have a bankrupt law passed that will enable them to bring those debtors into the United States courts and to lay hold of this land and divide it up. And I may say in connection with this subject that our loyal friends throughout the South, a very large number of whom have written to me on this subject, regard this as one of the most beneficial measures for them. The universal sentiment among the loyal people of the South, the real loyalists so far as I have been able to discover it in my correspondence, and it has been quite extensive, is that as a mere measure of reconstruction, as a measure of settlement, as a measure to put things upon a proper basis in the South, nothing would be so beneficial to them as the passage of a bankrupt law. And in reference to the sentiment of northern creditors on this subject, the great mass of the southern debt is in the northern cities, and I believe every city of the North unless it be the city of Cincinnati, through the boards of trade, through every organ of the creditor interest of those cities where the great mass of southern indebtedness is held, has given expression to a universal and almost unanimous opinion in favor of the passage of a bankrupt law. So that this class of persons who it is feared are going to be injured by the passage of a bankrupt law, in consequence of their holding debts against the South, are more clamorous for its passage than even the persons who desire to take the advantage of it themselves.

Mr. JOHNSON. My information is of the same character with that stated by the honorable member from Vermont; and if I had not been so informed, reasoning on what I know must be the condition of the South, I should have come to the same conclusion myself. The difficulty mentioned by the honorable member from Ohio does not exist in point of fact in the first place; at least I am so told. A northern creditor can sue in the local courts and get judgment and get his process with as much facility as any southern creditor, if there be southern creditors; and he can make his money out of the assets, whatever they may be, of his debtor just as soon as any other creditor. But that is not the difficulty in which the northern creditor would be placed. These gentlemen own large estates; they are now comparatively valueless. Most of them were in debt when the war commenced; they are of course in debt still, and their negroes have been emancipated, their lands have been desolated because of the war, and they have now no means at all of cultivating them to advantage. The result is that they sell their lands to different purchasers. The debtor of to-day who owns a thousand acres is forced to-morrow to sell, and the next day perhaps he only owns one hundred acres, if he owns any, if he does not sell all. There being no bankrupt law, that places what would have been assets, and will be assets if you pass this bill, out of the reach of the creditor; he cannot follow the lands into the hands of a purchaser under the bankrupt, there being no existing bankrupt act.

But that is not all. The local creditor may sue, or the northern creditors may sue, such of them as think proper to sue, and he who sues first gets his judgment first, gets his execution first, and then the property is sold to satisfy his debt, and it often sells for not more than enough to satisfy that debt. I saw a statement the other day, showing the destitution of the South and how completely their property was rendered valueless, of the sale of a sugar plantation that had been purchased a few years ago at $225,000; I suppose there were some slaves upon it. It was bought in the other day at a compulsory sale at $25,000. If the bankrupt law had been in force that estate would have gone into the hands of the assignee, and he could have husbanded the estate from time to time until eventually what inured only to the benefit of the creditor suing, to the extent of $25,000, might have brought $200,000 and gone to the payment of all the debts.

I look upon the bill, therefore, as effecting two things, effecting one just as completely as it does the other, and both of them very proper objects. The first is, that it enables the creditor to secure at once against the debtor and against rival creditors the assets of his debtor; and the other is, that it enables the debtor to escape the thralldom of debt.

Mr. POMEROY. I have thought that perhaps there has been no time in the history of the country when a bankrupt law would be so generally sustained as now. During this whole war there has been an impression and a belief that at its close a bill of this character would be necessary and would be sustained. I know that so far as relates to the States bordering on the rebellion their business men have been destroyed, to a great extent, by raids, by marauding parties taking their goods and destroying their property. This Government cannot reimburse them, whether the damage was done by the Union or the rebel armies. The Government cannot make good the illegal acts of its own forces, and never undertakes to repair damages done by the rebel army. If we intend to afford any relief to the men who have been thus circumstanced, there is no course left to us but to pass a bankrupt law and relieve them in that way if we would have them again enter upon the trades, occupations, and business which they have followed.

As to the objection suggested by the Senator from Ohio, which he thinks will be made by that class of men in the North who trade with the South, I have only to say that I do not believe it will make much difference to them whether this bill becomes a law or not. If twenty-five years experience of trading with the South has not taught them anything, they will not be apt to learn it in the future. There never has been a time for many years past when a man from the North could enforce the collection of a debt there, unless he was of that standing and character which enabled him to have friends and supporters there. I have been associated with men who could not appear in the courts there, men who believed as I do. There has been no time in twenty years past, or at least within the past ten years, when they could collect a debt there at all. There may be exceptions, but this has been the general rule; and if men persist in selling goods in that direction let them take all the risks. I have no objection to their doing it, but they must take the risks. I noticed that in St. Louis as soon as the rebellion closed large quantities of goods were shipped South on short time. During the war they had been selling goods for cash, if they sold at all; but at its close they commenced selling on thirty or ninety days credit, and I happen to know that in very many cases these short bills went to protest and the time was extended and extended, but they are not collected yet. It is only the old experience of twenty years that has been reenacted over again.

Sir, I do not think that a bankrupt law of this character will ultimately work any injury to the community at large, though it may for a time to individuals. I shall vote against this amendment because I follow the recommendation of the committee, believing that if they have not matured this bill it cannot be perfected by an individual amendment, especially if it is an amendment that requires the reorganization of the whole bill. I can see very many reasons why a law of this kind should not be retrospective; but at the same time, coming out of this war as we have done, trying to wipe out what we cannot cure, I am for passing this bill and letting us see its results.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to submit a motion that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary with instructions to report a bill on the subject of bankruptcy with provisions as follows:

I. That no person shall be authorized to become a voluntary bankrupt except on the conditions following:

First. He shall relinquish all his property to the assignee in bankruptcy for the benefit of his creditors, regardless of State exemptions, except a specified amount not to exceed in value $500.

Second. His indebtedness provable under the act must amount to at least $1,500.

Third. The assets shall pay at least thirty per cent. of any debt existing at the time of the passage of the act, or otherwise the same shall not be discharged unless a majority of the creditors consent.

Fourth. No debt contracted or accruing after the passage of the act shall be discharged by certificate in cases of voluntary bankruptcy unless the assets shall have paid fifty per cent. of the amount proved.

Fifth. All future acquisitions of the bankrupt, obtained by descent, devise, bequest, or in the course of distribution, shall be subject to the payment of his former debts.

Sixth. No debt shall be discharged unless it be specified in the original or supplementary schedule of the debtor or presented for proof by the creditor.

II. Involuntary bankruptcy shall be subject to the following restrictions:

First. The petitioning creditors seeking to obtain a judgment of bankruptcy must represent and establish against the alleged bankrupt an indebtedness not less than $1,500.

Second. A specified amount of property not to exceed $1,000 shall be exempt from the proceedings, in favor of the head of a family, and not to exceed $500 in other cases.

Third. Subsequent acquisitions, as in the case of involuntary bankruptcy, obtained by devise, descent, bequest, or in the course of distribution, shall be subject to the payment of discharged debts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri to recommit the bill with these instructions.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I inquire whether that motion is in order at this time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Certainly. A motion to recommit supersedes a motion to amend.

Mr. HENDERSON. I shall not take up the time of the Senate in discussion; but I suppose that this proposition presents a test vote. It may be that a majority of the Senate do not agree with me in my views in reference to this matter; and I admit that if the bill be recommitment it will be perhaps the end of it for this session. If it be not recommitment, possibly it would be as well to perfect it and pass it at once, as we have but little time.

My view is that it is inexpedient and improper to pass any bankrupt law at present. I am rather inclined to think that our experience upon the subject has demonstrated that there is no necessity for any law of this character. Anyhow, no bankrupt law that has been passed by Congress has given satisfaction to the people. The first law that was adopted (in 1800) was continued in force only five years. It was repealed within a few years after its passage. The act of 1841 was repealed by the same Congress which passed it. The act was passed in August, 1841, and repealed in March, 1843. It was in force but a short time.

This bill is a much more sweeping act than either of those laws. It will be remembered that the act of 1800 followed the English rule of bankruptcy, the rule which was in force when our Constitution was adopted, which I apprehend the framers of the Constitution had reference to when they declared that Congress should have power to pass uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy. In England at that time there was no such thing as voluntary bankruptcy. It was all involuntary. No man had a right to go into court and make a schedule of his debts and pray for a judgment of discharge from his indebtedness, either the indebtedness existing at the time or that which might be contracted subsequently. It was all involuntary or coerced bankruptcy. The act of 1841, although it provided for voluntary bankruptcy, had many provisions which were much better than the provisions of this bill, because it did not permit every individual, or almost every individual, no matter what might be his indebtedness, to pray for a discharge; but this act provides that any man who owes $300 of indebtedness may apply.

I apprehend that the State laws in almost every State of the Union grant $300 exemption. Hence the effect will be that parties who own $300 worth of property and perhaps owe three or four hundred dollars of indebtedness, instead of dividing that property among their creditors, will present a petition to the district court for a discharge and use up that money in the payment of costs and fees and charges in procuring a bankrupt's certificate, instead of dividing the money among honest creditors. My experience is that where a debtor has given evidence of his honesty and his intention to pay his debts there is but little trouble in procuring a third or a half in value of the creditors at any time to agree to release him. Hence, if the bill should be passed, I am clearly of the impression that some amendment such as that offered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] ought to be adopted if it is made to apply to debts already existing.

It is true that by the Constitution there is no limitation on our discretion in that respect as there is in regard to the States. Congress cannot pass an ex post facto law, but it may pass a law impairing the obligation of contracts. The Constitution provides that the States shall not pass laws impairing the obligations of contracts. Hence it is utterly impossible for a State to pass a law operating upon present or existing contracts and discharging individuals from them. It has been so decided and settled. What was it that induced the Convention to adopt a provision of that sort? The simple idea that prevailed in regard to ex post facto laws, that laws of that character are unjust within themselves. Parties make a contract in view of the existing law, and therefore it should not be interfered with. It has been decided by the Supreme Court, in the case referred to by the Senator from Maryland, that the States may discharge from contracts entered into after the passage of an insolvent law.

Mr. JOHNSON. As between their own citizens.

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, sir. Now, the idea of the Convention in the adoption of this provision was, perhaps, merely a continuation of the idea existing at the time that Congress might regulate commerce. It strikes me that there is no necessity for a bankrupt law as between citizens of the same State. It is best to leave the States to regulate that matter for themselves. For instance, Indiana does not desire any bankrupt law to control contracts or debts so far as the citizens of Indiana are concerned. So in regard to New Jersey; New Jersey would prefer, so far as her own citizens are concerned, to determine that matter for herself. So of my own State. But as it has been decided by the Supreme Court that a bankrupt's discharge under a State law will not be good as against a creditor residing in another State from the one where the discharge was obtained or where the contract was entered into, an act of this sort in all probability is necessary so far as to regulate trade between citizens of different States.

It must be seen that this law is more extensive in its operation than any law I am aware of that has ever been adopted either in England or in this country. The English law applied only to traders, to merchants, not to individuals who did not undertake to make a livelihood by trade, commerce, business, buying and selling for profit. By the English law of bankruptcy none others could avail themselves of it. This law, however, like the act of 1841, extends to all classes of individuals, and I am satisfied that the unpopularity of the act of 1841 in a great degree proceeded from the fact that the door was open for all persons to obtain bankrupt certificates voluntarily. That was the cause of its repeal. That presented the obnoxious points, and presented them so strongly to the minds of the people as to induce the repeal of the act very soon.

I have provided in the instructions which I have submitted that when a man asks to be discharged as a bankrupt all his property shall be transferred except $500. In case of involuntary bankruptcy I submit that in all probability a larger amount could be very justly and properly exempted from the operations of the law; but where the bankrupt himself asks to be discharged ought he not in all reason to give up a greater amount of his property? Is it unjust to require him, when he prefers to surrender his property and obtain a bankrupt certificate, a discharge from all his indebtedness, to reserve a smaller proportion than where he is forced into bankruptcy? I believe not. It is a voluntary thing with him. If he desires to surrender the property and asks for it, let him have less exempted than in the other case. I do not think any voluntary clause should be left in the bill. If I had the framing of it I would have no voluntary clause in it. I would follow the act of 1800 on that subject, and not adopt the provision of the act of 1841 which rendered it so odious to the community. But if the bankrupt sees fit to insist upon a discharge let him surrender all his property except $500.

My second provision is that his indebtedness provable under the act must amount to $1,500 at least. The Senator from Vermont will see that after a party owing $300 can proceed and go through all the necessary costs of procuring a certificate, the $300 will be entirely used up in the costs of the proceeding, and there will be nothing left for the creditors. Why not then put some limitation on it—such a limitation anyhow as would be available to the creditors to a certain extent, and let them have something? What is the use of a party taking the little that he may have and proceeding voluntarily to obtain a discharge as against his creditors, and give it to the officers of the court instead of to the creditors? Surely, after paying the costs of the proceeding and the fees of the officers, even the amount I propose would leave very little for the creditors.

I further provide that the assets shall pay at least thirty per cent. of any debts existing at the time of the passage of the act. For my own part I would not let it operate upon any debt existing at the time of its passage if I could. I agree with the Senator from Oregon, that the idea prevalent in the Convention which induced the framers of the Constitution to say that no State should pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts, arising as it did from a feeling of justice toward others, should induce us to be at least very wary how we interfere with existing obligations and contracts.

I do not appreciate the argument of the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Maryland who spoke of the distress in the South. I cannot see that this bill is to be very beneficial to the people of the South. I do not so look upon it. I cannot see that it will help the people of the South who are now passing stay laws, as we are informed, to protect themselves. The land-owners who are in the Legislatures, it is said, are passing stay laws to protect themselves and their people. I cannot see that to declare all those laws invalid and tear them up root and branch and turn the property of those people over to registers in bankruptcy is to benefit them materially. It may give them a discharge, but what good does the discharge do when all their lands are sold?

Mr. POLAND. It is to help their creditors.

Mr. HENDERSON. I doubt whether it will help their creditors. I am sure that the constituency I represent are as much interested in this matter as perhaps any people, because the credits in my State against the people of the South are very large. They were very large when the rebellion broke out, and they have not been paid since. I do not think that my constituency, standing in the light of creditors, will be benefited by the passage of this law. I cannot see that it will benefit the people of the South or benefit the people of the North to whom they are indebted.

Where a man is disposed to do right, where he is disposed to be honest, as I have said before, a majority of his creditors can be obtained almost at any time to release him upon the payment of a fair percentage of his indebtedness. I would not, therefore, interfere with existing contracts any further than I could help. Then I require that at least thirty per cent. of the existing indebtedness be paid.

The fourth provision is that no debt or contract accruing hereafter shall be discharged in the case of a voluntary certificate unless the assets shall pay fifty per cent. of the amount proved. This subject was examined many years ago, under a resolution of the New York Legislature, by the chancellor and the judges of the supreme court of the State of New York. After having examined very thoroughly into the operation of the insolvent and bankrupt laws of the State of New York, they made a report, from which I beg leave to read an extract:

"Judging from their former experience, and from observation in the course of their judicial duties, they were of opinion that the insolvent law was the source of a great deal of fraud and perjury. They were apprehensive that the evil was incurable and arose principally from the infirmity inherent in every such system. A permanent insolvent act, made expressly for the relief of the debtor, and held up daily to his view and temptation, had a powerful tendency to render him heedless in the creation of debt, and careless as to payment. It induced him to place his hopes of relief rather in contrivances for his discharge than in increased and severe exertion to perform his duty. It held out an easy and tempting mode of procuring an absolute release to the debtor from his debts; and the system had been, and still was, and probably ever must be, from the very nature of it, productive of incalculable abuse, fraud, and perjury, and greatly injurious to the public morals.

If we hold out an inducement by a general law to every man who may be involved to the extent of $300 to proceed and get a bankrupt's discharge by giving that $300 to the officers of the court, will it not present the temptation here spoken of? If a man in business knows that without paying any part of his indebtedness he may if he becomes insolvent procure a discharge and forever stand exempt from the obligation of his debts, is it not a very great inducement to the commission of fraud? If not, it most certainly is to the indulgence of great heedlessness and recklessness in business. I would therefore put some limitation on voluntary bankruptcy in this respect that I would not apply to involuntary bankruptcy. I propose that where a party applies to procure for himself the benefits of the act he shall pay some part of his indebtedness.

If this distress is so very great as is supposed by the Senator from Maryland and the Senator from Vermont in regard to existing debts, I still apprehend that thirty per cent. of them can be paid, and if not that a majority in interest of the creditors will at least agree to the discharge of the party. That is my experience. I repeat that where good faith is shown by a debtor generally his creditors are perfectly willing to give him his discharge upon the payment of a very small percentage of his indebtedness. But in regard to subsequent indebtedness I would not hold out this inducement, that any man who is reckless and careless in business may procure a discharge without paying at least one half of his indebtedness, unless by the consent of the creditors. I would still let the creditors give him his discharge by consent.

There is another instruction which I have embodied, that all future acquisitions of the bankrupt, obtained by descent, devise, bequest, or in the course of distribution shall be subject to the payment of his former debts. I am perfectly willing to relieve all future acquisitions by labor, but I am wholly unwilling, so far as I am individually concerned, to allow a party to hold a bankrupt's certificate and to receive large inheritances and to enjoy those inheritances free from the payment of his debts. It seems to me that it is unjust, and that it produced a good deal of the ill-feeling against the acts previously passed, and it will have the same effect again.

Finally, I provide that no debt shall be discharged unless it be specified in the original or supplementary schedules of the debtor or presented for proof by the creditor.

In reference to involuntary bankruptcy, I say first, that the petitioning creditor, seeking to obtain a judgment of bankruptcy, must represent and establish against the alleged bankrupt an indebtedness of not less than $1,500. Two hundred and fifty dollars indebtedness is all that is required by the bill now in order to push the party to bankruptcy. The reasons I have given in reference to applying a law of that character to merchants, traders, and those having credits in other States than the States of their residences will apply very strongly in support of this provision.

I provided also that in cases of involuntary bankruptcy a specific amount of property, not exceeding $1,000, shall be exempted in favor of the head of a family, and not exceeding $500 in other cases. The Senate, it is true, has expressed its opinion on this point, and that is to leave the exemption laws of the respective States to apply, and the Senator from Maryland thinks that provision constitutional. I cannot bring my mind to that opinion. However, I do not desire to enter into any remarks upon it now. I feel very clear that if the law be passed with that provision not much good will result from it, because the States, in order to retain for themselves the entire magistracy over this subject, will pass such exemption laws as will render perfectly futile the operation of this measure, and it will do no good.

There ought, therefore, to be some specific amount specified. I put the amount at $1,000, which is larger than in cases of voluntary bankruptcy. Where a party comes in voluntarily and seeks a discharge he ought to surrender nearly all his property. Where his creditors push him to bankruptcy there is some reason why he should have a larger exemption. If $1,000 dollars be not sufficient let him have $2,000, and if that be not sufficient let him have $3,000. I am not particular about the amount, but I think the amount ought to be specific and made applicable in each and every State of the Union, because very great injustice will be worked by suffering the different States to avoid the payment of their creditors outside, for it will be remembered that so far as their own citizens are concerned they can regulate this matter for themselves, and it is only in reference to outside creditors that it becomes necessary to have a bankrupt law at all.

The remaining proposition of this branch of the instructions is the same as the last one of the other, namely: that after the discharge all acquisitions that come from relatives by descent, devise, bequest, or in the course of distribution, shall be subject to the payment of the debts. That is the old Maryland law of insolvency, and a very good provision it is.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I should not have a word to say upon the proposition of the Senator from Missouri except for his suggestion that this will be a test vote. I shall probably not vote for the bill, and yet I would not vote for his proposition to recommit. I think that defeats the bill; I think it is due to the committee, on so grave a question as this, to allow the bill to come to a final vote, mainly upon the propositions that shall come from the committee, at least from such portions of the committee as support the measure; and it is for that reason that I shall vote against the proposition of the Senator from Missouri to return the bill to the committee. This bill received very full consideration by the Judiciary Committee at the last session, and, with some exceptions, is perhaps as good a system of bankruptcy as can be established. I do not say it is a perfect bill; but the objections to the bill are perhaps inherent in the subject of the legislation itself. While I shall probably not vote for the bill, I have voted against bills with more confidence in my judgment upon the subject than in this instance.

The Constitution clearly contemplated a uniform and perhaps a permanent system of bankruptcy in the country, and I am inclined to the opinion that if a good system can be once established to take the place of the various systems of the States it will be an advantage. The evil of the times grows out of the different systems of insolvency in the different States. Clearly the framers of the Constitution contemplated some uniform and perhaps permanent system; and while I will not vote for this bill perhaps, because I do not know what is the pleasure of the people I represent on the subject, yet I repeat that I think it is but fair to allow the bill to come to a vote, and I shall vote against amendments calculated to embarrass the bill. I shall only vote for such amendments as I think will improve the bill, and for none with a view to embarrass it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not propose to speak to the particular amendment suggested by my friend from Missouri, because, if I understand correctly what the Senate has already done, it has decided substantially against each one of his propositions. The honorable member tells us that he doubts very much whether the clause in the Constitution was intended to embrace or does embrace other than traders, and that it was not contemplated to provide for cases of voluntary bankruptcy. It is true that at the time the Constitution was adopted the bankrupt laws of England were made applicable exclusively to traders, but England long since has applied them to all other classes; and the power to apply them to other classes in the Parliament at the time the Constitution was adopted nobody could have questioned. The clause, therefore, which gives to Congress the power to pass bankrupt laws has been considered as equivalent to the same power existing in Parliament; and the Supreme Court, in the case of Sturgis vs. Crowninshield, admit, I think, very clearly that the clause embraced every class of debtors, and was not confined to traders. In the same case they also, in words, state that under that power Congress may provide for voluntary as well as involuntary bankruptcy. I have the opinion by me.

Mr. HENDERSON. That question did not arise in the case.

Mr. JOHNSON. It did not arise in that case in some respects. That case involved the constitutionality of a State insolvent law which undertook to discharge debts, and in considering that question Chief Justice Marshall, who gave the opinion, went into an examination of the whole subject: first, what was the extent of the congressional power to pass bankrupt laws; secondly, how did it conflict with the power of the States to pass insolvent laws? It was maintained in relation to the power of the States that they had not authority by an insolvent law to discharge a debt. The Chief Justice said it would be exceedingly difficult to decide that a law passed by a State discharging a debt and all the subsequent acquisitions which the debtor might make would not be an insolvent law within the powers which the States had because of the reservation; in other words, he did not consider the power with which Congress was clothed to pass laws on the subject of bankruptcy as interfering with the right of the States until that power was exercised to pass laws discharging debts as between their own citizens; and in express terms the court admit that it is in the power of Congress under its authority to pass bankrupt laws to include every variety of bankrupts, every class of bankrupts, and also to provide that a bankrupt might himself apply for the benefit of such laws.

The motion to recommit was not agreed to.

The question recurred on the amendment proposed by Mr. WILLIAMS; and being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 10, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cowan, Cragin, Fogg, Grimes, Henderson, Lane, Trumbull, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Brawn, Chandler, Conness, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Harris, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, McDougall, Morgan, Norton, Patterson, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Riddle, Ross, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wade, and Yates—26.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cattell, Cresswell, Davis, Dixon, Foster, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Guthrie, Kirkwood, Morrill, Nesmith, Nye, Saulsbury, and Sprague—16.

Mr. POLAND. In the last section of the bill the provision is that "no petition or other proceeding under this act shall be filed, received, or commenced before the 1st day of November, A. D. 1866." I move to strike out "November" and insert "April," and to strike out "1866" and insert "1867;" so as to take effect the 1st day of April, 1867.

Mr. HARRIS. I think it would be better to say June.

Mr. POLAND. I will modify my amendment so as to say June instead of April, to make it take effect on the 1st day of June next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be so modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. I move to strike out the thirty-seventh section of the bill, and I ask the Clerk to read that section.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

SEC. 37. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of this act shall apply to all corporations and joint stock companies, and that upon the petition of any officer of any such corporation or company, duly authorized by a vote of a majority of the corporators present at any legal meeting called for the purpose or upon the petition of any creditor or creditors of such corporation or company, made and presented in the manner hereinafter provided in respect to debtors, the like proceedings shall be had and taken as are hereinafter provided in the case of debtors; and all the provisions of this act which apply to the debtor, or set forth his duties in regard to furnishing schedules and inventories, executing papers, submitting to examinations, disclosing, making over, secreting, concealing, conveying, assigning, or paying away his money or property, shall in like manner, and with like force, effect, and penalties, apply to each and every officer of such corporation or company in relation to the same matters concerning the corporation or company, and the money and property thereof. All payments, conveyances, and assignments declared fraudulent and void by this act, when made by a debtor, shall in like manner, and to the like extent, and with like remedies, be fraudulent and void when made by a corporation or company. No allowance or discharge shall be granted to any corporation or joint stock company, or to any person or officer or member thereof: Provided, That whenever any corporation by proceedings under this act shall be declared bankrupt, such decree of bankruptcy shall work a forfeiture of all the franchises of such corporation, and the affairs of such corporation shall be wound up in the manner provided in this act in respect to natural persons.

Mr. HOWARD. This section applies to bodies corporate and does not apply to natural persons, whether individuals or associations of partners. By its very terms it is applicable to corporations; and it makes no distinction between the various kinds of corporations, whether they be trading commercial corporations or corporations for any other purpose.

Originally, it was beyond a doubt the purpose of a bankrupt act to discharge the person of the debtor from arrest, or as the case might be to discharge him from the liability under which he labored. I may be mistaken, but I am of the impression that the English bankruptcy laws do not apply to corporations. Such laws have always been regarded as laws for the relief of honest, unfortunate debtors, and for the benefit of creditors, and they apply, I think, exclusively to natural persons, not to corporations.

A corporation exists only by express law. Corporations in the States draw their being from the statutes of the States, which statutes are called their charters. Their existence, all their attributes, all their liabilities, all penalties imposed upon them, the very life and being, the very soul and essence of a corporation is derived from the State statutes. The States have full and complete control over corporations erected or created by their laws; and I have yet to learn that it is within the constitutional competency of Congress to interfere in any way whatever with the functions or operations of State corporations. If I am wrong about this I should like very much to be set right by the learned chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, who I have no doubt is fully prepared [Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Vermont has charge of the bill] to explain this subject, which is somewhat mysterious to me. I do not understand how such a clause could have got into a Federal bankrupt bill. The mode of winding up a State corporation, the mode in which it shall exercise its functions, the mode in which it shall die and be buried, are all prescribed by the charter or by the laws of the State applicable to these corporations; and until now it has, I believe, been unheard of that Congress has attempted to step in and regulate the mode by which a State corporation shall cease to exist or be wound up. Still I find in this bill this strange clause, and to me it is a very strange clause, that whenever any corporation by proceedings under this act shall be declared bankrupt—

Such decree of bankruptcy shall work a forfeiture of all the franchises of such corporation.

To me this is a very strange principle. I do not believe we have power to do this. I do not believe that under the bankrupt clause of the Constitution Congress is authorized to step in and declare what shall be or what shall not be cause of forfeiture of a State charter. It is not, perhaps, even generally true of trading corporations erected by the States that insolvency is absolutely a cause of forfeiture. It may be a cause of forfeiture or it may not be, according as the State legislation has established; but can Congress declare a cause of a forfeiture of chartered rights which are not declared to be such by the State legislation? If we can, I beg some gentleman to point out to me in the Constitution whence this anomalous power is derived. I do not see it in the Constitution as yet.

Again, sir, as I have already remarked, there is in this clause no discrimination between the various kinds of corporations. It does not declare that commercial or trading corporations only shall be subject to the act and lose their charters in case of insolvency, but it brings within its broad sweep every corporation that is capable of contracting a debt and standing in the relation of debtor. Sir, you may commence with the humble corporations known ordinarily as lyceums, for there are a great many in the country, and library associations, all of which ordinarily are authorized to contract debts. This bill includes them and throws them and their little property into the immense maelstrom of the bankrupt assets. It includes every town library association that exists by charter. It includes every mechanics' association that possesses the faculty of contracting a debt. It includes every bank erected throughout the United States under a State charter. It includes every railroad corporation. It includes every association possessed of corporate rights and existing under a State charter, and declares that in case such corporation shall be declared bankrupt in a Federal court under the proceedings here detailed in this bill, proceedings entirely alien and foreign to the proceedings presented by the State laws, it declares that whenever any one of those corporations shall become bankrupt it shall forfeit its charter, and, as a matter of course, cease to exist.

The committee had to take but one more step, and they might have taken that step, in my judgment, with precisely the same propriety that they took this step, and have gone so far as to declare that every State of the Union that is insolvent may be brought into a bankrupt court and have its State rights and State sovereignty forfeited by a bankrupt decree!

Now, Mr. President, I do not believe the authors of the Constitution ever contemplated any such thing as this; but that when in the Constitution they gave to Congress the power to pass uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy they meant the bankruptcy of natural persons, for they knew as well as we do that a State corporation can exist only by virtue of its State charter; that it can act only upon the principles recognized in the State charter; that its whole existence, operation, life, and death are regulated and prescribed by the legislation of the State. It would be rather an interesting spectacle certainly for the creditors of the innumerable corporations existing in the States to come before the bankrupt court, file a petition, and actually drive these corporations into insolvency and into a forfeiture of their charter.

All the property of these innumerable corporations is thus exposed to be placed in the hands of an assignee in bankruptcy, and to be administered as ordinary bankrupt assets, and the very existence of these corporations, valuable as they are to the State, is placed at the mercy of the Federal power, and this bill yields the principle—and it is a great fault of the bill—that Congress may declare what may be the cause of forfeiture, and that that cause of forfeiture may be something different from the cause or causes of forfeiture embraced in the State charter or in the State laws.

Sir, let us be a little cautious how we tread upon this forbidden ground. Let us abstain, so far as reason requires, from trenching upon what hitherto has been acknowledged as the exclusive jurisdictional limits of the State governments. I move, sir, to strike out this whole section.

Mr. JOHNSON. The proposition of the honorable member from Michigan involves two questions. The first is the most material; the other, as far as the law is concerned, such a law as we may pass beneficially, is comparatively unimportant. The first question is, whether the power to pass bankrupt laws embraces corporations. The second is, if it does embrace corporations, to what extent we may apply the remedy which the bankrupt law affords. The power conferred upon Congress to pass uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy is of course as comprehensive as it could be made; and the only question, therefore, is whether a corporation can be a bankrupt. What is bankruptcy? What is being a bankrupt? Bankruptcy is an inability to pay debts. A bankrupt is the party who is unable to pay his debts. Then, whether a corporation can get itself brought into a state of bankruptcy and be, in the estimation of the law, a bankrupt, depends upon this inquiry: what is, in contemplation of law, a corporation? Is it not a person named a corporation? That the Supreme Court has decided.

The first case that arose—I speak now from recollection, but I know I am right in substance—in the Supreme Court was, whether a corporation could sue in the courts of the United States unless all the corporators were citizens of the same State and the party sued was a citizen of another State, and the court decided that the jurisdiction did not attach unless it was averred, and proved if denied, that all the corporators were citizens of the one State. The court soon corrected their error. I say their error, because they admitted it to be an error. It was found exceedingly pernicious, and in a great measure to defeat the object of the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, to inhibit a corporation from suing in the United States courts, which was practically a positive inhibition, if it was necessary to prove as well as to aver that all the corporators were citizens of one State. Some ten or fifteen years ago, therefore, when the question was again presented, the court, I believe by an opinion in which the judges all concurred, decided that in the view of the judicial clause of the Constitution of the United States conferring jurisdiction upon the courts of the United States a corporation is a citizen of the State which incorporates it and where it has its location.

Mr. HOWARD. That is the present doctrine of the Supreme Court.

Mr. JOHNSON. And that is now the doctrine. They have more than once reviewed it and always with the same result.

That being the case, a corporation, in the eye of the Constitution, according to the doctrine of the Supreme Court, is a person, is a person entitled to sue and liable to be sued in the United States courts where the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States depends upon the residence of the parties, as we know it does in cases where they must be citizens of different States. That being so, it would seem to follow necessarily that a corporation also is a person who may become a bankrupt. To consider it as a person for the purpose of contracting debts and suing for their recovery and liable to be sued to enforce debts which it may owe, and not to consider it as a person against whom any other remedy can exist in favor of creditors, would appear to be almost absurd.

Now, what is the remedy which the bankrupt law affords? First, the compulsory process is but a remedy. It is a means furnished the creditor to enforce the performance of his obligation on the part of the debtor, and where it exists it is almost as potential, and is rather more potential in its actual, fruitful results than permitting the creditor to go into the courts and sue the corporation. If it is fit and proper that a creditor of a corporation should be entitled to the remedy of collecting his debts in whole or in part by means of the compulsory process which a bankrupt law affords, why should it not be equally in the power of the corporation to avail itself of the voluntary clause? If we have the right—and I do not argue that now, because the Supreme Court have recognized the right—of passing a voluntary as well as a compulsory bankrupt law, and if it is right to subject corporations to a compulsory bankrupt law, why is it not right to give them the benefit of a voluntary bankrupt law?

But there are other motives, if there was any doubt on the subject, which I think are persuasive to show that the law should be made to operate upon corporations. I do not mean of course to charge it universally as true of the corporations to be found within the several States; but the most gigantic frauds, the frauds which have done more than anything else to unsettle confidence in the integrity of our people, both at home and abroad, have been the frauds perpetrated through the instrumentality of charters. Everybody can recollect the case of the Ohio Trust Company, chartered by Ohio, composed, it was thought, of some of the best men in that State, and at the beginning so it was. They got involved after receiving upon deposit millions and millions of money, and having their offices in nearly all the commercial towns of the country, and particularly in New York, all at once, either by fraudulent misconduct or mistake they became bankrupt and ruined thousands. If there had been a bankrupt law in force at the first moment it was discovered that they were about to get into a hopeless state of bankruptcy their assets might have been taken advantage of and the creditors might have saved themselves from actual total loss.

Look at the railroad companies. How many of them have almost ruined their creditors? They first exhaust the whole amount of their capital; they then contract a running debt, and that will not do; the road is not completed; and then they mortgage a first and second and third time, to the injury of those who are creditors upon open account; and the first mortgage goes into the courts of the States and closes up the corporation, and all the debtors are ruined, where they are in a condition to be ruined by the loss of their debts.

So in relation to banks. What was the case here the other day in this city? A bank, with a capital of some two or three hundred thousand dollars, called "national," and therefore obtaining a confidence which the name alone gave because sanctioned by an act of Congress, went into debt to the amount of millions, and not a creditor will get, perhaps, ten cents in the dollar. It was known for several weeks that they were in a ticklish condition, and if some of the creditors had then been armed with the compulsory process which the bankrupt law affords their debts might have been saved.

The other question, and the one which I said is not so material to the beneficial operation of this bill, is to what extent will you carry the remedy? The bill provides that the franchise itself is to be forfeited, the whole concern wound up. Upon reflection I think it would be advisable to change that part of the bill. The effect of it would be that if you proceed against any of these corporations who have property worth nothing except as it may be used in connection with a franchise, you destroy the value of the property if you put an end to the franchise. As is suggested by my friend behind me, [Mr. SHERMAN], a railroad is worth nothing unless it is worked. The United States by this bill—and according to my view they would not have the authority to do it if the bill or any other bill undertook to do it—declare that the franchise may be forfeited. I will not stop to inquire whether they can forfeit the franchise or not. That is a question not necessary to be discussed, as I think, because unimportant in the view which I am about to present. We declare by this bill as it stands that if a railroad company is declared a bankrupt, either upon a voluntary or a compulsory application, the franchise is to be forfeited and the concerns of the company wound up. Many of those franchises are of inestimable value. The franchise itself is property, and it is only valuable as property as long as it remains a franchise. To extinguish it is to strike out of existence the property itself. The assignee in bankruptcy therefore might be authorized to sell the road or to sell the franchise instead of providing that the franchise itself is to go with the bankruptcy.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to inquire of the Senator if he is of the opinion that the assignee can sell the franchise?

Mr. JOHNSON. That is a question that requires some consideration. The franchise is sold under State laws.

Mr. HENDRICKS. When the Legislature of the State agrees to it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Very well. I do not see that it makes much difference. If the franchise is property, and that I assume is true—I suppose that will not be denied—and if it is property that may be used for the purpose of paying the debts of the corporation, then I do not see why the assignee in bankruptcy cannot sell it as well as the creditor who sues in a State court. Does my honorable friend from Indiana deny that it is competent for a creditor to sue a corporation, get his judgment, and levy it upon the road itself and sell every thing? What can he do under that judgment? Supposing it to be a railroad corporation he can sell all the motive power; he can sell all the iron rails and all the ties, and leave nothing but the naked bed; and where the bed itself belongs to the company he can sell that. Then what is there left?

Mr. HENDRICKS. In reply to the Senator my view is this: that the road, the bed, the track, the rolling stock cannot be sold except the Legislature of the State creating the corporation has authorized its sale, either directly or indirectly. As the Senator is aware, most of these questions come up on foreclosures of mortgages. The Legislature, authorizing the corporation to mortgage its property, impliedly authorizes the sale of its property upon the foreclosure of the mortgage. But if the Legislature has merely created a corporation and authorized it to transact a class of business, and that corporation has fallen in debt and the creditor takes a judgment at law, in the absence of an express authority to sell, I apprehend that the officer of the court cannot sell, and that the only remedy of the creditor then would be to go into chancery and, through the instrumentality of a receiver, take possession of and use the property. I have not recently examined the question with great care, but it is a troublesome one.

Mr. JOHNSON. Could any decree a chancellor could pass in the case cited by the honorable member enforce the corporation to carry on the road, compel the president for the time being or the directors to remain president or directors? If not, who is to appoint them? How is the road to be carried on?

Mr. HENDRICKS. In the case which I have mentioned the court appoints the receiver, and through its own officer takes possession of the corporate property and uses it for the benefit of the creditors, and makes the money for the creditors out of the use of the property itself, and does not undertake to sell the property, and thereby pass the franchise.

Mr. JOHNSON. The question is not whether we can extinguish the franchise; I have said just now I thought it was better the franchise should not be extinguished for other reasons; but if the State can authorize a creditor of a corporation to come into a court of chancery and have a receiver appointed to take possession of the road and to carry it on for the benefit of the creditors, why cannot we, by a bankrupt law, authorize the assignee to take possession of the road and carry it on for the benefit of the creditors? To destroy the franchise instead of benefiting the creditors would be an injury. The only benefit that the franchise can be to the creditors is by enabling the creditors to have the benefit of the franchise, and that can only be by exercising the franchise. If the franchise be in a company authorized to carry on a railroad, and authorized to do nothing else, then in order to secure the creditor the advantage of the franchise it may be necessary to give to the assignee in bankruptcy the authority to carry on the road, just as my friend admits chancery might in a State court, independent of any mortgage incumbrance, authorize a receiver to be appointed and give him the power to carry on the road for the benefit of all the creditors. What I suggested, however, was—and I make the suggestion to my friend from Vermont, who has more particularly this bill in his charge as quasi chairman—that I think he had better amend the latter part of the section so as to preserve the franchise.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I did not interrupt the Senator from Maryland with a view of controverting any of his positions, but my purpose was entirely and only to have the benefit of his view upon a question which, after hearing the argument of the Senator from Michigan, somewhat troubled my mind. A corporation exists by virtue of State legislation. What this corporation may do depends altogether upon the will of the State Legislature, and how the franchise may pass from one person to another ordinarily depends upon the will of the Legislature; and it has not been regarded as a thing to be sold by the corporations themselves or by a court at law. The question upon my mind was this: what shall be done with the corporate property when the assignee takes possession of it? He cannot permanently retain the possession, and therefore the answer of the Senator from Maryland did not meet the trouble fully. What will the assignee do with the corporate property? If he cannot transfer the franchise the corporate property, as has been so forcibly demonstrated by the Senator from Maryland, is almost valueless. Can the assignee by a sale of the corporate property pass with it the franchise, the right to use it as the corporation itself might use it?

I am certainly in favor of striking out this proviso, and I hope the Senator having the bill in charge will consent to that. I think it suicidal. I think you might as well provide in the other portions of the bill that when a man is declared a bankrupt he shall be put to death as to provide that a corporation being declared bankrupt its franchises shall cease, its life shall cease. If we can do this, we ought to do that. If we can sell the corporate property, and pass with that the right to use it under the State laws, that is the end which is desirable. And before the vote is taken on the motion of the Senator from Michigan I move to strike out the proviso.

Mr. JOHNSON. There is no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana moves to amend the amendment by striking out the proviso in the section proposed to be stricken out by the Senator from Michigan, and the question is on that amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to inquire whether that motion is in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A motion to amend the amendment is in order.

Mr. HOWARD. My motion is to strike out the whole section, and the motion of the Senator from Indiana is to strike out a part of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment is in order.

Mr. POLAND. It seems to me that if my friend from Michigan had examined this bill through and with a little more care he would not have been so much alarmed at this thirty-seventh section. It extends the provisions of this bill to corporations. The term used is broad enough, to be sure, to include colleges, academies, lyceums, and every variety of corporations, although they are not business corporations and not likely to have any debts. But it seems to me that if my friend from Michigan had examined a little further and had seen that no corporation could be proceeded against, unless it had been guilty of an act of bankruptcy, he would have had very little fear for the academies, colleges, and lyceums. The same provisions, both for voluntary and involuntary bankruptcy, are extended to corporations, in order to allow the creditors of a corporation to proceed against it and to wind it up under this system of bankruptcy. They have, in the first place, to establish that the corporation has committed an act of bankruptcy. In the case of an individual there are a great variety of things that amount to an act of bankruptcy; but in the case of a corporation the only act of bankruptcy that could be charged would be the making of a fraudulent assignment or a fraudulent concealment of their property. We could hardly suppose that in the case of a college.

Mr. HOWARD. Does the Senator from Vermont mean to say that voluntary proceedings may not be taken by a corporation?

Mr. POLAND. By no means, sir. The fear that the Senator expressed was, that under the involuntary system proceedings would be instituted against religious and educational and eleemosynary corporations and they would up. There is very little fear of a corporation of that sort committing an act of bankruptcy by making a fraudulent assignment of its property. But the section was not intended for that class of corporations at all, and I am entirely willing to have the section amended, and will propose, if the gentleman's motion to strike out the whole section does not prevail, to amend it so that it shall apply to all banking, trading, and business corporations. That is what the section was intended for.

When as to the application the Senator refers to by the corporation itself or by its officers, the voluntary system of bankruptcy in favor of the corporation, what can be the object of that? This section itself provides that where the officers of a corporation carry it into bankruptcy, a case of voluntary bankruptcy on the part of the corporation, no debt against the corporation shall be discharged and no claim against any stockholder or officer of the corporation. What could be the object on the part of the corporation or of its officers, or on the part of anybody, to carry the corporation voluntarily into bankruptcy, when the act itself provides that when they get through there shall be no allowance made to them in property, no discharge granted to the corporation or any of its officers or stockholders, and when they have got through and surrendered everything they have got precisely where they started, and if there are any debts not paid they owe them the same as before if contracted as a corporation, and if there is a liability on the part of the stockholders or officers the same liability remains.

It seems to me that the section with this limitation—and I am willing that it shall be confined to banking, business, and trading corporations, that is the real purpose and object of it—is very necessary. We have found it so in my own State, and they have in other States. I understand that in Massachusetts their insolvency system in the first place left out corporations; and they were obliged to put them in. I know very well, you know, Mr. President, [Mr. EDMUNDS in the chair,] that in our State some of the greatest attempts at defrauding creditors have been made under the guise of manufacturing corporations. In 1841, when the last bankrupt law before this was passed, one of the greatest objections to that bill on the part of its opponents was that it did not include these banking and trading corporations; and those persons who are conversant with the history of those times understand very well that the failure to include corporations in that bill was one of the great features of its unpopularity, one of the great reasons why that bankrupt law was repealed.

In relation to the last clause, the portion of the proviso about forfeiture, I feel a little scruple myself whether Congress has a right to declare a forfeiture of the charter. It is wholly unnecessary for the purposes of this bill to retain it, and I shall be content to have those words stricken out, and indeed it seems to me rather necessary that they should be stricken out, because this section itself saves all the remedies in favor of the creditors against the corporation. If we destroy the corporation, forfeit its franchise and take it away, what would the remedy of the creditors be good for against the corporation? What is the use of saving remedies in their favor if we destroy the corporation itself? Inasmuch as their whole property is to be surrendered and no discharge is to be executed I can see no possible danger arising from leaving the franchise, the corporate existence to remain; and therefore, as I said in the outset, I shall be willing to have this section modified so as to make it extend only to banking, trading, and business corporations and companies, and to strike out in the proviso the words "such decree of bankruptcy shall work a forfeiture of all the franchises of such corporation."

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, as I have already remarked, I am in favor of a judicious and well-framed bankrupt law, if we can have one, and I shall probably vote for the present bill on its final passage if it ever reaches that point. I wish, however, to call the attention of the Senate, and particularly that of the honorable Senator from Vermont, to the danger of a collision of jurisdiction in the operations of this law. In most of the States, I believe, they have a system of winding-up acts in regard to banks, by which the banks of the State, if they become insolvent, are wound up, their affairs closed, and their assets distributed among their creditors. We have a system like that in my State, and I presume there is a similar system in other States.

Now, take for instance a case of this kind: a bank in the State of New York becomes insolvent, if you please bankrupt, using the word "bankrupt" in the sense of insolvent. Proceedings are taken on the part of the State authorities to wind up the bank and distribute its assets. A receiver is appointed by an order of the court of chancery, whose duty it is to enter upon the premises, take the books and assets of the bank, and hold them subject to the order of the court, and the court afterward proceeds to sell the property and distribute the avails. Now, suppose during any portion of this proceeding a creditor of the bank, acting under the involuntary clause of this bankrupt bill, should file his petition in the bankrupt court, and ask to have that bank and its affairs committed to the kind care of an assignee in bankruptcy, and the Federal court or bankrupt court should make such an order: how is such an order to be enforced?

It would inevitably bring on a collision of jurisdiction between the two courts, or rather between the Federal authority and the State authority, which would be very unpleasant. If, however, this bankrupt act shall be adjudged to be the paramount law, if upon this large field of subjects it is supreme, then it would be competent for the bankrupt court, at any moment before the final distribution of the assets of an insolvent bank, to lay hold of those assets and dispose of them according to the provisions of this bill, in defiance and contempt of the laws of the State upon precisely the same subject.

I call the attention of the honorable Senator to this view of the matter for the purpose of further illustrating the objection which I make to this portion of the bill upon constitutional grounds. I cannot understand how Congress by way of a bankrupt act can exercise any power or authority over corporations which are purely the creatures of State legislation. If the power belongs to the State to regulate its own corporations, if the State gives them their peculiar faculties, imparts to them life and all the laws of their being, it must be and is an exclusive power, one with which we cannot interfere. My objection rests upon the fundamental principle that we have not, in reference to State corporations, the power to interfere; at least I think not. I am not sure that the question has ever been adjudged in any court. It is to me not entirely a new one, to be sure, for I have reflected upon it before.

If the Senate should not see fit to strike out the entire section for the reasons which I have alleged, I think the amendment suggested by the Senator from Vermont, confining the section to trading corporations, would be a very decided improvement, and I should vote for it.

Mr. POLAND. I do not apprehend that there can be any such difficulty in relation to conflict of jurisdiction as the Senator from New York suggests. In my own State we have a statute system of winding up an insolvent bank, and I suppose they have in every State, some of them more extensive than ours, applying to all corporations; but I do not suppose, if this bill passes and becomes a law and corporations are brought within the provisions of it, that if proceedings were pending under the State law and the State court had got full jurisdiction of the whole subject the United States court would interfere, or would have any right to interfere, to take away the administration which had been begun in the State court. That is the ordinary and general principle: where there are concurrent jurisdictions, where there are two courts, either of which may have jurisdiction of the same subject, the one that first takes jurisdiction retains it and has it. That is a familiar principle, which my friend from Michigan must understand as well as anybody.

In relation to the constitutional doubt that my friend suggests, although these corporations are made by the State; although, instead of being natural persons, they are creatures that are born out of State laws, still if they can be debtors and creditors I do not apprehend there is any question but what they may come within the purview of a bankrupt law. I do not desire to go into—

Mr. HOWARD. Then I suppose, if the Senator will allow me, he would hold that the jurisdiction of the district or bankrupt court in such a case as I put would out the jurisdiction of the State court.

Mr. POLAND. Not by any means, if the State court had first taken jurisdiction.

Mr. HOWARD. That is only in cases of concurrent jurisdiction. Here, according to your theory, the Federal legislation is supreme, and there would be no concurrence.

Mr. POLAND. So far as regards a general bankrupt law, between a bankrupt law as passed by Congress and a bankrupt law as passed by a State, I understand that when Congress has acts the State law itself becomes inoperative. When Congress have legislated on a subject that is specially within the jurisdiction of Congress their legislation ousts the State legislation. But there are a great variety of suits at law: ordinary suits, where a party may sue either in the State courts or the United States courts; but when he has once sued in the State court or in the United States court, and that court has got jurisdiction, that is the end of it. That is a principle that is perfectly well settled. It is precisely so here. Where there is a system of State law by which a corporation may be wound up, and its assets distributed among the creditors, and here is a general bankrupt law under which the United States courts might take jurisdiction of it, if the State courts get the first jurisdiction under the State law, which is not superseded by the general bankrupt law, they retain it; and the idea that the United States court would afterward take away that jurisdiction it seems to me is an objection entirely without foundation.

Mr. BUCKALEW. There seems to be considerable difference upon this present question. I propose to submit a motion to the Senate upon which all Senators can agree. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. POLAND. Senators all understand how very difficult it has been to get this measure before the Senate. I have been notified by the chairman of the Committee on Finance that the day after to-morrow he intends to proceed with his appropriation bills. I really hope—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will remind the Senator from Vermont that debate is not in order on a motion to adjourn.

Mr. HENDRICKS. There will be no difficulty in getting a vote to-morrow.

Mr. POLAND. I desire simply to say that if the Senate propose now to adjourn, I shall ask the Senate to-morrow to proceed with the bill until it is finished.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

The Clerk read the title of the resolutions as follows:

Joint resolutions in regard to Hon. JAMES R. DOOLITTLE.

Several MEMBERS. Read, read.

The SPEAKER. It is not usual under this call to have these resolutions read. Is there objection?

Mr. LE BLOND. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will put the question.

The question was taken on having the resolutions read, and it was decided in the affirmative.

The Clerk accordingly read as follows:

Whereas joint resolutions were passed at the last session of the Legislature of Wisconsin declaring it to be the duty of Hon. JAMES R. DOOLITTLE to resign the office of United States Senator, in which resolutions his course and votes upon measures devised by Congress to secure permanent peace and protection to the people, his disobedience of instructions by the Legislature to vote for the passage of the civil rights bill, and his desertion of the cause of human rights were fully recited as reasons for thus declaring it to be his duty to resign; and whereas Senator DOOLITTLE has disregarded said resolutions and the wishes of the people of Wisconsin therein expressed, and yet adheres to his seat in the Senate in violation of duty, and did in a speech in the Senate on the 28th of July last wrongfully attribute the passage of said resolutions to a "tyrannical Republican caucus able to control a majority of the Legislature," and has repeatedly declared in public speeches that the Legislature passing said resolutions did not truthfully reflect the voice of the people; and whereas Senator DOOLITTLE has renounced fidelity to his former professions and principles, has deliberately put himself in active antagonism to those principles of justice and equal rights which should be the foundation of republican government, by uniting his political fortunes with those of the enemies of the Republic, has grossly betrayed a constituency that elevated him to the Senatorship, and by faithlessness to the high trust confided to him has shown himself totally unworthy of further confidence and support; and whereas the people of the State of Wisconsin, uniting their voice with that of the nation, have delivered their solemn verdict in direct condemnation of the purpose, policy, and course of the Senator, and thereby adjudged him guilty of a flagrant breach of political trust; Therefore Resolved, by the Assembly, (the Senate concurring,) That Senator JAMES R. DOOLITTLE be, and he is hereby, instructed to resign his senatorial office.

Resolved, That the Governor be requested to forward to the Presiding Officer of each House of Congress, and to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress, a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolutions.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

The call of the States and Territories for bills and joint resolutions having been concluded, the House resumed the consideration of the following resolutions offered last Monday by Mr. KELSO:

Resolved, That for the purpose of securing the fruits of the victories gained on the part of the Republic during the late war, waged by rebels and traitors against the life of the nation, and of giving effect to the will of the people, as expressed at the polls during the late election by majorities numbering in the aggregate more than four hundred thousand votes, it is the imperative duty of the Thirty-Ninth Congress to take, without delay, such action as will accomplish the following objects:

1. The impeachment of the officer now exercising the functions pertaining to the office of the President of the United States of America, and his removal from office upon his conviction in due form, of the crimes and high misdemeanors of which he is manifestly and notoriously guilty, and which render it unsafe longer to permit him to exercise the powers he has unlawfully assumed.

2. To provide for the faithful and efficient administration of the executive department within the limits prescribed by law.

Mr. LOAN. On those resolutions I now move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; the pending question being upon Mr. JENCKES' motion to refer the resolutions to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. JENCKES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were referred; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to:

EQUAL SUFFRAGE.

Mr. NOELL. I offer the resolutions I send up to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk commenced the reading of the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That Governments were made for the people, and not the people for the Government—

Mr. BLAINE. I rise to a point of order: and my point of order is that the gentleman has already offered one resolution under this call.

Mr. NOELL. I do not think I have offered a resolution under this call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman offered a resolution in January last: the call has rested with the State of Missouri since the holidays.

Mr. NOELL. Have I a right to offer the resolution by a vote of a majority?

The SPEAKER. A majority can give the gentleman leave to offer the resolution.

Mr. BLAINE. Missouri has held the floor for resolutions for four Mondays; I think other States should have a chance to be heard. I do not know the object of the gentleman's resolution, but I appeal to him not to insist upon offering it now, but let other States be heard.

Mr. NOELL. I do not ask to debate the resolutions now; I only ask leave to offer them, and then let them go over under the rule.

Mr. BLAINE. I will not object to that.

Mr. NOELL. I ask leave merely to submit the resolutions.

No objection was made.

The resolutions were received and read, as follows:

Resolved, That Governments were made for the people, and not the people for the Government; that every adult citizen of sound mind in any State or Territory has the right to a voice in the formation of the constitution of said State, and in the representation and laws of said State, and that any State which disfranchises any class of its citizens on account of sex is not republican in form and should be overturned by Congress.

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia is hereby instructed to report to this House without delay a bill so amending an act entitled "An act to regulate the elective franchise in the District of Columbia," which passed Congress January 8, 1867, as to abolish the disfranchisement of persons from voting on account of sex.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary are instructed to report a bill calling a convention and authorizing every adult citizen of sound mind in the State of Massachusetts to vote for delegates to said convention for the purpose of making a constitution for said State republican in form.

Mr. NOELL. When I offered the other resolutions I was prevented by objections from the other side from explaining my object in presenting them. I desire to debate these resolutions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman rising to debate the resolutions, they will go over until next Monday, under the rule.

SUFFRAGE IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. FERRY presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Michigan, commending the action of Congress in passing a bill abolishing all distinction of color in the exercise of the elective franchise in the District of Columbia; which were laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

CONTRACTION OF THE CURRENCY.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I offer the following resolutions, upon which I call the previous question:

Resolved, As the opinion of this House that the public interest will not justify a greater curtailment of the national circulation than $4,000,000 per month, or $48,000,000 during the year 1867, which $48,000,000 ought not to be exclusive of and in addition to the compound-interest notes falling out during the current year.

Resolved, That in lieu of such an amount of compound-interest notes as may become due and be redeemed within the year, as may be in excess of the $4,000,000 of currency now authorized by law to be withdrawn from circulation each month, the Secretary of the Treasury ought to be authorized and required to issue United States legal-tender notes without interest.

The question was upon seconding the call for the previous question.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. Will it be in order to move to refer these resolutions to the Committee of Ways and Means?

The SPEAKER. If the previous question is not seconded and any member rises to debate the resolutions they will go over under the rule. If no member rises to debate them the motion to refer will be in order.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I hope the previous question will not be seconded.

Mr. CONKLING. I want to make an appeal to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] to at least allow us to understand these resolutions before we are called upon to vote upon them.

Mr. LE BLOND. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order pending the call for the previous question.

Mr. CONKLING. I am not debating the resolutions; I am appealing to the gentleman to withdraw his call for the previous question, and for leave to do that I am not beholden to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LE BLOND.]

The SPEAKER. That is in the nature of debate, and is not in order if objected to by any member.

Mr. BLAINE. If the previous question is not seconded will a motion to refer them be in order?

The SPEAKER. If no member rises to debate the resolutions a motion to refer will then be in order.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That would be equivalent to killing the resolutions.

Mr. ROSS. I would ask if the resolutions are susceptible of division if we come to a vote upon them?

The SPEAKER. There are two separate resolutions, and a vote can be demanded on each one of them.

The question was then taken upon seconding the call for the previous question; and upon a division there were—ayes 45, noes 69.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, called for tellers upon seconding the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, and Mr. LE BLOND were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 40, noes 76.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. BLAINE. I rise to debate the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Debate arising the resolution goes over under the rules.

HOLDING EVENING SESSIONS.

Mr. KASSON. I offer the following resolution, on which I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That on and after to-morrow, and until otherwise ordered, the House will take a recess daily, except on Saturdays, from half past four p. m. to half past seven p. m.; and that on reassembling the first hour each evening shall be devoted to hearing and considering reports of committees, under the same regulations that now govern the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. As this resolution proposes to change the order of business so as to have at night proceedings as if in the morning hour, a two-thirds vote is necessary for its adoption.

On seconding the call for the previous question there were—ayes 40, noes 68.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I rise to debate the resolution.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to modify the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that, by the usage, the call for the previous question not having been seconded, some gentleman opposed to the call is entitled to the floor. The gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WENTWORTH,] who opposed the demand for the previous question, rises to debate the resolution, and it goes over under the rule.

Mr. KASSON. Can I not offer another resolution?

The SPEAKER. Only by consent of a majority of the House.

REDUCTION OF THE CURRENCY.

Mr. PRICE. I offer the following preamble and resolutions, on which I demand the previous question:

Whereas much embarrassment now prevails in the country, affecting injuriously the commercial and other interests thereof, on account of the uncertainty of what may be done by this Congress affecting the volume of currency now in circulation: Therefore, be it

Resolved, (as the opinion of this House,) That any greater reduction of the currency than that already authorized by law, to wit, $4,000,000 per month, would not be advisable.

Resolved, That the said reduction should be so managed as to take the amount so retired and canceled from the interest-bearing notes, and not from the non-interest-bearing notes.

Resolved, That that part of the compound-interest notes which shall fall due during the next year and shall not be retired and canceled under and by virtue of the law now authorizing the retirement and cancellation of $4,000,000 per month should have their places supplied by legal-tender notes bearing no interest.

Mr. CONKLING. I rise to a point of order. My point is that in effect this is the same resolution which was introduced by the gentleman's colleague, [Mr. WILSON, of Iowa.] I ask the Speaker to examine it.

Mr. PRICE. Allow me to say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] that I wrote this resolution a month ago, and have had it lying in my desk ever since. It is not the resolution introduced by my colleague; but covers additional ground and has reference to different points.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will decide the point of order raised by the gentleman from New York. It has been decided repeatedly that though a resolution totidem verbis the same as one on which the House has already acted cannot be introduced, yet a proposition differing in language, although it covers precisely the same ground, can be entertained. The Clerk will read from page 12 of the Digest. The Clerk read as follows:

"No motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment. And no bill or resolution shall, at any time, be amended by annexing thereto, or incorporating therewith, any other bill or resolution pending before the House. (Rule 48.) The latter clause of this rule, as originally reported to the House, contained at the end of it, 'nor by any proposition containing the substance, in whole or in part, of any other bill or resolution pending before the House.' Those words were stricken out by the House before it would agree to the rule, by which it would seem to have been decided that an amendment containing the substance of another bill or resolution may be entertained. (Note to rule 48.) Such, too, has been the practice ever since."

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I desire, if it be in order, to move the following as a substitute for the resolutions of the gentleman from Iowa:

That the public interest demands that there shall not be any reduction in the amount of the outstanding United States notes, commonly called "greenbacks," during the current year.

The SPEAKER. No amendment is in order unless the gentleman from Iowa withdraws the demand for the previous question.

Mr. PRICE. I insist on the demand.

Mr. WARD, of New York. I desire a division of the question, so that the vote on these resolutions may be taken separately.

The SPEAKER. It will be in order to call for a division after the previous question is recorded.

On seconding the call for the previous question there were—ayes 49, noes 71.

Mr. PRICE called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. PRICE and CONKLING were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 68, noes 69.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I rise to debate these resolutions.

The SPEAKER. Debate arising, the resolutions go over under the rule.

Mr. GRINNELL. I offer the following resolutions, on which I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That the public interest demands that there shall not, during the current year, be any reduction in the amount of the outstanding United States notes commonly called greenbacks.

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report such bill as may be necessary to effect this object.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 51, noes 64.

Mr. GRINNELL demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. GRINNELL and Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 68, noes 66.

So the previous question was seconded.

The question then recurred, Shall the main question be now put?

Mr. POMEROY demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORRILL moved that the resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 71, nays 82, not voting 87; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Ancona, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Bergen, Bidwell, Blaine, Boutwell, Boyer, Brandegee, Broomall, Campbell, Conkling, Cooper, Dawes, Deming, Denison, Dixon, Dodge, Eldridge, Eliot, Finck, Garfield, Glessbrenner, Aaron Harding, Hart, Hawkins, Hise, Hogan, Holmes, Hooper, Hulburd, Humphrey, Hunter, Jenckes, Kasson, Kerr, Ketcham, Ladin, George V. Washburn, Welker, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—82.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, Barker, Benjamin, Chanler, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dawson, Delano, Driggs, Hale, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Jones, Latham, McCullough, McIndoe, Mercur, Myers, Newell, Phelps, Price, Radford, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Sitgreaves, Starr, Strouse, Taber, Nelson Taylor, John L. Thomas, Elihu B. Washburne, Woodbridge, and Wright—87.

So the House refused to lay the resolutions on the table.

The question again recurred, Shall the main question be now put? on which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 87, nays 66, not voting 41; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Beaman, Bingham, Blow, Bromwell, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Cullom, Defrees, Delano, Deming, Donnelly, Dumont, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Goodyear, Grinnell, Griswold, Abner C. Harding, Harris, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Hill, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James R. Hubbell, Ingersoll, Julian, Kelley, Kelso, Koontz, Kuykendall, William Lawrence, Leftwich, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marshall, Marston, Marvin, Maynard, McClurg, McIndoe, McKee, Miller, Morris, Moulton, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Plants, William H. Randall, Ross, Sawyer, Schenck, Shellabarger, Sloan, Stevens, Stillwell, Stokes, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thayer, Francis Thomas, Thornton, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Whaley, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—87.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Ancona, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Bergen, Bidwell, Blaine, Boutwell, Boyer, Brandegee, Broomall, Campbell, Conkling, Cooper, Davis, Dawes, Denison, Dixon, Dodge, Eldridge, Eliot, Finck, Garfield, Glessbrenner, Aaron Harding, Hart, Hise, Hogan, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Hulburd, Humphrey, Hunter, Jenckes, Ketcham, Ladin, George V. Lawrence, Le Blond, McRuer, Moorhead, Morrill, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Ritter, Rogers, Rollins, Scofield, Shanklin, Spalding, Trimble, Burt Van Horn, Andrew H. Ward, Hamilton Ward, William B. Washburne, Wentworth, and Winfield—66.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Arnell, Delos R. Ashley,

Barker, Benjamin, Bromwell, Bundy, Chanler, Culver, Darling, Dawson, Driggs, Eckley, Hale, Hawkins, Asahel W. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, Jones, Kasson, Kerr, Latham, McCullough, Mercur, Myers, Newell, Phelps, Price, Radford, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rousseau, Sitgreaves, Starr, Strouse, Taber, Nelson Taylor, John L. Thomas, Elihu B. Washburne, Williams, Woodbridge, and Wright—41.

So the main question was ordered.

During the vote,

Mr. GLESSBRENNER stated his colleague, Mr. DAWSON, was paired on all questions with Mr. MYERS.

Mr. LONGYEAR stated his colleague, Mr. DRIGGS, was absent on account of sickness.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The resolutions were then adopted.

Mr. GRINNELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EVENING SESSIONS.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move to suspend the rules to offer for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That until otherwise ordered the House will on each day, except Saturday, take a recess from half past four until half past seven o'clock, for the transaction of business.

The question being put, there were—ayes 48, noes 68.

Mr. PRICE and Mr. ROLLINS demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the rules were not suspended.

ROLL OF HONOR.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following joint resolution.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I call for the regular order.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I hope the gentleman will allow me to offer this. It will not take any time.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I will yield.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the thanks of Congress and of the country are due, and are hereby tendered, to Hon. Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War; Major General M. C. Meigs, Quartermaster General; and Brevet Lieutenant Colonel James M. Moore, Assistant Quartermaster, for their care in collecting and burying the loyal and honored dead of the war, and for their persevering labors in obtaining the names of those who died, whether of wounds received in battle, disease, or starvation in rebel prisons, and publishing them upon the "rolls of honor" of the nation.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FARNSWORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts allow me to offer a resolution to go to the Committee on Printing?

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir. The resolution was accordingly read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be instructed to inquire into the expediency of printing for the use of the House of Representatives the digest of the statutes of the United States prescribing the rates of duties on imports and the cost thereof, including any compensation to the compiler.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing under the law.

POOR OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts allow me to submit a joint resolution appropriating $25,000 for the relief of the poor of the District of Columbia?

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I will allow it to be offered.

Mr. LE BLOND. Let it be reported.

The joint resolution was read, as follows: Whereas the extreme severity of the present winter has doubled the sufferings and distress of the poor: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That there is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $25,000, to be paid to Major General O. O. Howard, to be distributed to the suffering poor of this District, without distinction of race or color, in such sums or in such mode as may seem to him shall be proper; and that he report his acts and doings under this act in detail to the next Congress.

Mr. CONKLING. I would like to know whether the gentleman from Illinois will allow me to offer an amendment, that the sum so appropriated shall be embraced in the next tax levy of the city of Washington?

Mr. INGERSOLL. No, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the objection?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I think it would be unjust to impose this upon the tax-payers of this city. There are several thousand people—

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object to debate.

Mr. McKEE. I object to the introduction of the resolution.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield for that motion?

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I do not.

Mr. ROSS. I suggest to my colleague that he insert a like appropriation for the city of Peoria, Illinois.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is not before the House.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE.

Mr. ELIOT. Will my colleague yield to me?

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. ELIOT. I desire to say that there are several matters of public interest to be reported from the Committee on Commerce, among others the river and harbor appropriation, and there has no opportunity offered for reports from that committee. I therefore ask that one week from next Saturday, after the morning hour, the Committee on Commerce may have an opportunity to report; and in the mean time I am in hopes that the river and harbor bill will be reported and printed, in order that action may be had upon it at that time.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I object.

Mr. ELIOT. Then I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I do not yield for that.

CONGRESSIONAL PRINTER.

The SPEAKER stated that the regular order of business was the consideration of the bill reported on Saturday from the Committee on Printing, providing for the election of a congressional printer, the pending question being upon Mr. TREMBLE's motion to lay the bill on the table, upon which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

Mr. ELIOT. I move to postpone the regular order of business for one hour.

The question was put, and there were—ayes 38, noes 61.

Mr. PRICE demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. ELIOT and HUMPHREY were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 60, noes 38.

So the consideration of the regular order of business was postponed for one hour.

REPORTS FROM THE COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE.

Mr. ELIOT. I now move to suspend the rules, so as to enable me to move that Saturday week be assigned for the consideration of reports from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Would it be in order for me to move to amend so as to include the Committee on Banking and Currency? I do not know of any reason why this privilege should be extended to the Committee on Commerce and not to other committees.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order to move to amend a motion to suspend the rules.

The question was taken on the motion to suspend the rules; and there were—ayes eighty; noes not counted.

So the rules were suspended, two thirds of the members present voting therefor.

Mr. ELIOT. I now move that Saturday next, after the morning hour, be set apart for the consideration of reports from the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

POOR OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move to suspend the rules to enable me to introduce a joint resolution appropriating $25,000 for the relief of the poor of the District of Columbia.

Mr. LE BLOND. I have repeatedly objected to this resolution, and shall do so now unless the gentleman will embrace the mayors of the cities of Washington and Georgetown.

The SPEAKER. The motion to suspend the rules is not debatable.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The mayor of the city of Washington does not desire to be one of the persons to distribute this fund.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 43, noes 53.

So (two thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House to the joint resolution of the Senate (S. R. No. 94) providing for the payment of certain Kentucky militia forces.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 433) for the relief of E. J. Curley; and a Joint resolution (S. R. No. 94) providing for the payment of certain Kentucky militia forces.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. LYNCH. I move to suspend the rules to enable me to offer the following preamble and resolutions:

Whereas the overthrow of the armed forces of the rebellion left the people of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Texas "deprived of all civil government;" and whereas the governments now existing in those States, established by the President of the United States, have no constitutional sanction, and, being under the control and administration of the leaders of the rebellion, fail to afford to loyal citizens of the United States that protection to which they are entitled: Therefore,

Resolved, That it is the duty of Congress immediately to establish such governments over those States as shall maintain the authority of the national Government, suppress violence, establish order, and protect all the citizens thereof in their lawful rights, to the end that they may as speedily as is consistent with the safety of the nation be restored to their former relations to the Union.

Resolved, That in the formation of new State governments for those States all loyal citizens have a right to participate and should be protected in the exercise of such rights by the national Government.

Mr. LE BLOND. Do these resolutions come in on leave?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine moves to suspend the rules to enable him to offer them.

Mr. BINGHAM. Do not these resolutions go to the joint Committee on Reconstruction without debate?

Mr. LYNCH. I move to suspend the rule which requires these resolutions to go to the joint Committee on Reconstruction, together with all other rules that would prevent their being received and considered at this time.

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order, and if agreed to, by a two-thirds vote the resolutions will come before the House for consideration until rejected or adopted, or disposed of in some other way.

Mr. LE BLOND. I call for the yeas and nays upon suspending the rules.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Let us take a vote by division first.

Mr. LE BLOND. We may as well take the yeas and nays at once; but if gentlemen desire it I will withdraw my call for the yeas and nays and let the question be first taken by a division.

The question was then taken upon suspending the rules; and upon a division, there were—ayes twenty.

Before the noes were counted,

Mr. LYNCH called for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and upon a division, there were—ayes fourteen.

Before the noes were counted,

Mr. LYNCH called for tellers upon ordering the yeas and nays.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes twenty-two.

So, there being in the affirmative one fifth of a quorum, tellers were ordered.

Messrs. LYNCH and INGERSOLL were appointed tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 25, noes 46.

So (one fifth voting in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. THAYER. I rise to a privileged motion.

The SPEAKER. There is one privileged motion now pending—the motion by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LYNCH] to suspend the rules in order to allow him to introduce the resolutions which have been read.

Mr. THAYER. Is not another privileged motion in order?

The SPEAKER. A motion to adjourn would be in order.

Mr. THAYER. I desire to move to reconsider the vote by which the regular order was postponed for an hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can enter a motion to reconsider that vote, but it cannot now be acted upon, pending the motion to suspend the rules; for if that motion should be agreed to it would suspend the rule by which the subject referred to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] was made the regular order.

Mr. THAYER. I would inquire of the Chair if a suspension of the rules under this motion would bring the resolutions of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LYNCH] before the House for discussion and consideration at the present time, to the exclusion of the regular business of the House?

The SPEAKER. That would be the effect of the motion if agreed to.

Mr. THAYER. Then I hope the rules will not be suspended.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 60, nays 82, not voting 48; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Baxter, Boutwell, Brandegee, Broomall, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Cullum, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Dumont, Ezegston, Grinnell, Abner C. Harding, Hayes, Higby, Hill, Ingersoll, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kols, William Lawrence, Loan, Lynch, Maynard, McClurg, Morrill, Moulton, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Pike, Rollins, Sawyer, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sloan, Stevens, Stilwell, Stokes, Francis Thomas, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Hamilton Ward, Warner, Wentworth, James F. Wilson, and Stephen F. Wilson—60.

NAYS—Messrs. Ames, Ancona, Bakker, Beaman, Bergen, Bingham, Blow, Boyer, Buckland, Campbell, Conkling, Cooper, Davis, Dawes, Deitres, Delano, Eckley, Eldridge, Eliot, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Finck, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Aaron Harding, Harris, Hawkins, Henderson, Hogan, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James R. Hubbell, Hulburd, Humphrey, Hunter, Jenckes, Ketchum, Kootz, Kuykendall, Ladin, George V. Lawrence, Le Blond, Leitch, Longyear, Marshall, Marvin, McIndoe, McRae, Miller, Moorhead, Morris, Niblack, Nicholson, Noel, Plants, Pomeroy, Price, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Raymond, Ritter, Rogers, R. R. Rousseau, Schenck, Shanklin, Spalding, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thayer, Thornton, Trimble, Trowbridge, Andrew H. Ward, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Windom, and Winfield—82.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, Banks, Barker, Benjamin, Bidwell, Blaine, Bromwell, Chanler, Culver, Darling, Dawson, Denison, Dodge, Driggs, Griswold, Hale, Hart, Hise, Ashel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, Jones, Kerr, Latham, Marston, McCullough, McKee, Mercer, Myers, Newell, Patterson, Phelps, Radford, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Sitgreaves, Starr, Strouse, Taber, Nelson Taylor, John L. Thomas, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Williams, Woodbridge, and Wright—48.

So (two thirds not voting in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended.

REMOVAL OF NAVAL ACADEMY.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to suspend the rules in order to enable me to offer a resolution for action at this time.

Mr. THAYER. I rise to a privileged motion; I move to reconsider the vote by which the regular order was postponed for an hour.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the gentleman to hear my resolution read; I am not certain but Philadelphia is interested in it.

Mr. THAYER. I will hear the resolution read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the propriety of an immediate removal of the United States Naval Academy from its present location in the State of Maryland to some point in a loyal State where the pupils in that institution will be secure against the surrounding political and social influences hostile to the national Government, which now predominate at Annapolis; and that the committee report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. THAYER. I withdraw my motion to reconsider.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now move that the rules be suspended, in order to enable me to submit for consideration at the present time the resolution which has just been read.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 96, nays 36, not voting 48; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Brandegee, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Davis, Deming, Dixon, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Abner C. Harding, Hawkins, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Hill, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Koontz, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, Maynard, McClurg, McIndoe, Miller, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, Raymond, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Seefeld, Shellabarger, Spaulding, Stevens, Stokes, Thayer, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aornam, Burt Van Horn, Robert F. Van Horn, Hamilton Ward, Warner, Wentworth, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—96.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Bergen, Bingham, Campbell, Cooper, Deftrees, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Aaron Harding, Harris, Hise, Hogan, Humphrey, Hunter, Kerr, Kuykendall, Le Blond, Lettwich, Marshall, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Ross, Rousseau, Shanklin, Stilwell, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Francis Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, and Andrew H. Ward, and Winfield—36.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, Baldwin, Banks, Barker, Benjamin, Bidwell, Boyer, Bromwell, Chanler, Culver, Darling, Dawes, Dawson, Delano, Denison, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Griswold, Griswold, Hale, Hart, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbard, Jones, Latham, Marvin, McCullough, McKee, McKuer, Mercer, Moorhead, Myers, Newell, Phelps, Radford, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rogers, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Starr, Strouse, Taber, Nelson Taylor, John L. Thomas, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whaley, Williams, Woodbridge, and Wright—48.

So (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the resolution was received.

Mr. SCHENCK. I demand the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. PAINE. With the consent of the gentleman from Ohio, I desire to propose an amendment to his resolution—to strike out the words "to inquire into the propriety of an immediate removal," and insert in lieu thereof the words "to report a bill providing for the immediate removal."

Mr. PIKE. As a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, I hope that if this amendment be adopted the House will indicate to what place the Academy shall be removed.

Mr. SCHENCK. Some gentlemen around me ask me to modify my resolution by accepting the amendment which the gentleman proposes. I cannot do this; yet I am perfectly willing that the House shall vote upon the amendment; indeed, I am rather inclined to vote for it myself.

I will simply say that I have offered the resolution in good faith. I have seen too much of the social influences brought to bear upon officers and soldiers stationed in the midst of a community not sympathizing loyally with such officers and troops to wish to expose any longer these young cadets or pupils at the Naval Academy to the influences which by reason of their being educated at Annapolis may injuriously affect them as well as our future Navy and the prosperity of the country.

Mr. PAINE. I do not desire a separate vote on my amendment. Unless the gentleman from Ohio will accept it I prefer that it should not be voted on.

Mr. SCHENCK. The opinions of members vary so much in reference to the amendment that I cannot accept it.

Mr. PAINE. Then I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I renew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the call for the previous question.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will yield if the gentleman wishes simply to ask a question. I do not propose to open the subject for debate.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not wish to ask a question; I wish to debate the subject.

Mr. SCHENCK. I cannot yield for debate.

Mr. LE BLOND. I would like my colleague to inform us what particular necessity there is for the passage of this resolution. I for one have not heard any complaints on this subject, and I know no reason why we should adopt such a resolution.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I want to get the institution out of the political and social atmosphere which exists at Annapolis.

Mr. LE BLOND. I would like to offer an amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I insist on the call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded; there being—ayes 67, noes 40.

The main question was ordered; which was upon agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. LE BLOND called for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask for a division of the question upon this resolution, so that the vote may be first taken upon that part of the resolution ending with the words "to some point in a loyal State."

The SPEAKER. This resolution cannot be divided. The rule declares that a resolution or motion may be divided "if it comprehend propositions in substance so distinct that, one being taken away, a substantive proposition shall remain for the decision of the House." The portion of the resolution following the words the gentleman has quoted would not be intelligible if standing alone.

The question was taken on the adoption of the resolution; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 108, nays 35, not voting 47; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baxter, Beaman, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Brandegee, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

Mr. BINGHAM moved to suspend the rules, to enable him to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be and is hereby respectfully requested to report to this House what States now represented in Congress have ratified the amendment to the Constitution proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress.

The rules were suspended, and the resolution was received.

Mr. BINGHAM demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. CONKLING and Mr. BOUTWELL suggested that the resolution be modified so as to read "directed" instead of "respectfully requested."

Mr. BINGHAM accepted the modification. The resolution as modified was adopted.

Mr. BINGHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELECTIVE FRANCHISE.

Mr. NIBLACK. I ask unanimous consent for leave to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be, and is hereby, instructed to report a bill conferring the elective franchise within said District on all foreign-born male persons over the age of twenty-one years, who are entitled to naturalization under existing laws, and who have resided one year within the District, and have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I object.

PERE MARQUETTE HARBOR.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the House, a report of the chief of Engineers relative to the improvement of the harbors of Pentwater and Pere Marquette; which, on motion of Mr. FERRY, were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

BILLS ALLOWED TO BECOME LAWS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House the following letter from the Secretary of State.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, February 1, 1867.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive an authenticated copy of a preamble and resolution passed by the House of Representatives on yesterday, in which I am directed to inform the House whether certain laws, to wit: one a bill "to repeal section thirteen of 'An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes,' approved July 17, 1862," and another a bill "to regulate the elective franchise in the Territories of the United States;" which bills are reported by the Committee on Enrolled Bills to have been presented to the President of the United States respectively on the 9th and 12th ultimo, have been filed in my (this) Department.

In reply, I have respectfully to state that the two laws referred to in the resolution were this day filed in this Department, together with an accompanying note from Colonel William G. Moore, which note is as follows:

EXECUTIVE MANSION, WASHINGTON, D. C.,
January 31, 1867.

SIR: I am directed by the President to transmit to you an act to repeal section thirteen of an act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes, approved July 17, 1862; and an act to regulate the elective franchise in the Territories of the United States. These bills were presented to the President for his approval, and have not been returned by him to the House in which they originated within the time prescribed by the Constitution of the United States. Having therefore become laws, they are transmitted to you for such further proceedings as the laws of the United States require.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
WILLIAM G. MOORE,
United States Army.

To Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD, Secretary of State.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,
WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

To Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX, Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. I move that the communication be printed and referred to the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

The motion was agreed to.

CONGRESSIONAL PRINTER.

The SPEAKER stated as the next business in order the consideration of the bill reported last Saturday by the chairman of the Committee on Printing, providing for the election of a Congressional Printer, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. TRIMBLE to lay the bill on the table, on which the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LAFLIN. I ask our friends on the other side of the House if they are not willing to have the vote taken by yeas and nays on the passage of the bill at once instead of having them taken on the motion to lay it on the table.

Mr. TRIMBLE. My object was to have the yeas and nays on the question as a test vote. I suppose if it is taken on laying the bill on the table that will be a test vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman to insist upon his motion.

The question was taken on laying the bill on the table; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 32, nays 100, not voting 49; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Bergen, Boyer, Campbell, Cooper, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Aaron Harding, Hise, Hogan, Edwin N. Hubbell, Humphrey, Hunter, Kerr, Le Blond, Leftwich, Marshall, McCullough, Niblack, Nicholson, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Ross, Rousseau, Shanklin, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thornton, Trimble, Andrew H. Ward, and Winfield—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Bingham, Blow, Boutwell, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Culom, Davis, Dawes, Defrees, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Dumont, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hawkins, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Hill, Holmes, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James B. Hubbell, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Koontz, Kuykendall, Lufin, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, Marvin, Maynard, McClurg, McKee, McRuer, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Plants, Price, Raymond, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sloan, Spalding, Stevens, Stokes, Thayer, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Warner, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Whaley, James F. Wilson, and Windom—109.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, Baldwin, Barker, Benjamin, Bidwell, Blaine, Chanlor, Culver, Darling, Dawson, Delano, Denison, Dodge, Driggs, Hale, Harris, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Dennis Hubbard, Jones, Latham, McIndoe, Mercur, Myers, Newell, Noel, Phelps, Pomeroy, Radford, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Rogers, Sitgreaves, Starr, Stilwell, Strouse, Taber, Nelson Taylor, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Hamilton Ward, Elihu B. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, Williams, Stephen F. Wilson, Woodbridge, and Wright—49.

So the bill was not laid on the table.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LAFLIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE.

The SPEAKER announced as the next business in order the consideration of bill of the House No. 889, to regulate the civil service of the United States and promote the efficiency thereof, on which Mr. SCHENCK was entitled to the floor.

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, who desires to make a report.

PRESIDENTIAL PROCLAMATIONS.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I rise to make a privileged report. In accordance with leave granted by the House, I report back from the Committee on the Judiciary House bill No. 859, to declare valid and conclusive certain proclamations of the President and acts done in pursuance thereof, or of his orders, in suppression of the late rebellion against the United States. I do not propose to consider this bill until the pending special orders, namely, the civil service bill and the bill equalizing bounties reported by the gentleman from Ohio are disposed of.

The SPEAKER. Those are pending by unanimous consent, and therefore take precedence of the bill reported by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I give the House notice that this will come up after those are disposed of.

COMMON SCHOOLS IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. LAFLIN, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That one thousand copies of the various bills to establish a system of common schools in the District of Columbia be printed together for the use of the House.

TARIFF BILL.

Mr. LAFLIN also, from the same committee, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That two thousand extra copies of the amendments of the Senate to the tariff bill be printed for the use of the House.

CIVIL SERVICE REPORT.

Mr. LAFLIN also, from the same committee, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That two thousand extra copies of the report of the joint select Committee on the Civil Service of the United States be printed for the use of the House.

LAND OFFICE REPORT.

Mr. LAFLIN also, from the same committee, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That ten thousand copies of the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, 202, with the separate and connected maps, and the balance with the connected map only, be printed for the use of the House.

Mr. LAFLIN moved to reconsider the several votes just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

VISIT OF AGASSIZ TO BRAZIL.

Mr. BANKS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House, if in his opinion it can be done compatibly with the public interest, a copy of every official correspondence which may have taken place respecting the recent visit to Brazil, for scientific purposes, of Professor Louis Agassiz.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. POMEROY in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being bill of the House No. 919, making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, the pending question being upon the following amendment offered by Mr. BLAINE:

For commencement of two additional forts for the defense of Portland harbor, Maine, including the purchase of sites, $150,000.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. I ventured to suggest the other day that it was worthy of consideration whether we should go into these extensive appropriations for fortifications upon the coast. Now, I will agree that I was mistaken when I said that these appropriations for two additional fortifications at Portland and at other places were not in the estimates; I find them in the estimates. But it will be noted that these are for fortifications additional to those already erected at those points.

It seems to be the case that our old forts and fortifications all along the coast are to be of no use, or of comparatively little use, on account of the great improvements in the armor and guns used on board of our ships, or perhaps on board the enemy's ships. It seems that extra fortifications are to be placed, not only at Portland, but all along the eastern coast.

I want the members of the House to be apprised of the fact that this is only the first of a series of appropriations, amounting altogether to an enormous sum. I will advert for a moment to the list of estimates for additional fortifications. I read from the estimates:

For two additional ports for defense of Portland harbor, Maine, $100,000.

For additional fort for defense of Portsmouth, New Hampshire, $75,000.

For additional fort for defense of Boston harbor, Massachusetts, $75,000.

For two forts for the defense of Narragansett bay, Rhode Island, $100,000.

For permanent defenses at mouth of Columbia river and at Admiralty inlet, $400,000.

There are some of the items of appropriation for new fortifications, which this appropriation bill is to be made to contain; and the first of the series is now moved as an amendment. I am content to vote for this appropriation for Portland harbor provided we are to go into this whole scheme of fortifications. If it is intended to inaugurate this system of new fortifications I will vote for this amendment, and I will vote for all others; but it is desirable that the committee shall understand what they are about to do. I have referred to this item for Portland harbor. If this amendment shall prevail, my friend and colleague, [Mr. SCHENCK,] the chairman of Military Affairs, will propose another amendment, and then another, and then another, until we shall have gone through the list of items which I have enumerated and what I read from the book of estimates. If the committee now understand the subject, if they understand that this is only one of a series of appropriations of the same character, and are prepared to vote for it with that understanding, then I will vote for it and for all of them. That is all I have to say, sir.

Mr. SCHENCK. As direct reference has been made by my colleague [Mr. SPALDING] to the action of the Committee on Military Affairs in connection with this subject, I will reply to him, though in but few words. The gentleman is right in regard to one portion of his statement, and entirely wrong in another. He says that if this amendment shall prevail it is the purpose of the Committee on Military Affairs to follow it up with other proposed amendments to the bill. He is wrong in saying we shall follow up this amendment by proposing amendments all the other items for which estimates have been made.

Mr. SPALDING. With perhaps one exception.

Mr. SCHENCK. And that exception is one that did not meet with the concurrence of the Committee on Military Affairs after a full investigation of the matter with the authorities at the other end of the avenue, the Secretary of War, and the chief of Engineers. That exception embraced a proposed appropriation of more money than all the other items put together. Now, how does this matter come before this committee from the Committee on Military Affairs? A bill is introduced from the Committee on Appropriations proposing certain items of appropriation to keep up the defenses of the country on the sea-coast. In reporting that bill they have left out a number of items in regard to which my colleague [Mr. SPALDING] now admits he was mistaken in supposing they were not estimated for by the War Department. They were items which therefore were estimated for, which were thought by the War Department to be necessary for the complete defenses of the country. Finding these items thus omitted from the bill from the Committee on Appropriations, the subject was brought to the attention of the Committee on Military Affairs, and they were asked to investigate these several items, and to move their adoption by way of amendment, or as many of them as the Committee on Military Affairs might think it expedient to propose for adoption into this fortification bill, when it should come up for consideration here.

The Committee on Military Affairs, in pursuance of this investigation, with the communication from the War Department before them, and the opportunity of obtaining facts from General Humphreys, the engineer-in-chief, considered the various propositions to amend by the insertion of other items and adopted those, which in the aggregate amount to between three and four hundred thousand dollars; but objected to reporting, and have instructed me not to report, one of the amendments, embracing a proposed expenditure of $400,000 for defense of the mouth of the Columbia river. In reference to the mouth of the Columbia river, the committee thought such was the character of the bar there, such the difficulty of entering it by vessels of any large draft, that probably a hostile fleet, or an enemy's vessel, if able to get over the bar, would be in a more dangerous condition than anybody on shore would be from their attack. The committee may have been mistaken about this; but our conclusion was not to recommend the adoption of that largest item. They were equally in favor of the examination of these other items; and I am instructed to move, among the rest, this item in relation to the defenses of Portland.

Mr. STEVENS. I may be mistaken, but my recollection is that the item now proposed to be inserted is not embraced in the estimates from the Department.

Mr. SCHENCK. It is estimated for, and is one of the five items which the Committee on Military Affairs agreed to recommend. My colleague [Mr. SPALDING] has satisfied himself by examination that he was mistaken in supposing these items were not estimated for, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] can by an examination of those estimates.

Now, one word more in reply to my colleague. He asks if this is a scheme to appropriate money for a new system of defenses. Not so; but it is to make additional defenses to those which we now have at points where additional defenses are needed; to extend the present system, not to abolish it or substitute anything for it.

With this explanation of the manner in which these matters are presented, the conclusions of the War Department approving and recommending to our consideration the items asked for, and of the action of the Committee on Military Affairs upon them—which was, as the gentleman must be advised, a discriminating action, for they rejected one portion of the recommendation and approved the other—with this explanation I am ready to submit this question to this committee.

Mr. BLAINE. On page 86 of the official estimates will be found this among other items:

For two additional forts for the defense of Portland harbor, $150,000.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] very kindly corrected the error into which he fell in that respect.

Mr. SPALDING. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Chairman, I renew the amendment. I corrected the gentleman from Ohio when he made the statement before as my colleague has done now. It is evident that the gentleman had not examined the question very carefully, for he denied on the former occasion that there were any estimates made for these fortifications.

I wish simply to say, Mr. Chairman, that plans and estimates for these works were made in 1861 by a board of engineers appointed by the Secretary of War. They found at Portland harbor three forts—one commenced some ten years since, the other two being old fortifications and entirely useless against modern vessels of war with modern armaments. These are an inner line of fortifications, constructed for the purpose of guarding the main channel to Portland harbor. But outside of these fortifications and outside of their range there is a high island behind which vessels can lie protected from the range of the old fortifications and shell not only the vessels in the harbor but the city itself. The board of engineers determined therefore that it was necessary to have other works. A large amount of money has been expended upon the old fortifications; yet they are entirely useless against modern war vessels unless an outer line of fortifications be constructed in accordance with the plan reported at that time. I wish the House to understand that this is not a new matter brought forward now for the first time. It is a part of the system of fortifications determined upon in 1861.

With these remarks, as the matter has already been fully explained, I leave the question.

Mr. HILL. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LYNCH] whether he knows of any estimates having been made by competent parties as to the entire cost of these proposed fortifications. This proposition is to appropriate $150,000 to begin with. Now, I would like to know what amount it is going to take to end this matter; how much we may expect to appropriate for this purpose before we get through.

Mr. LYNCH. I cannot answer that question. I do not know what is to be the entire cost of these fortifications. I suppose that with these, as other fortifications, the engineer department estimates the amount necessary to commence them; and the work goes on from year to year until completed.

Mr. HILL. Then, for all this House knows, the erection of these fortifications may involve an expenditure of five or ten million dollars.

Mr. LYNCH. I suppose that the engineer department and the War Department assume that it is necessary to protect our cities and harbors, cost whatever it may; that they report in favor of such works as will be effective for that purpose, the cost being a secondary consideration. The gentleman, I suppose, will not take the ground that if a fortification is necessary in order to protect our coast he ought to vote against it, even if it cost $10,000,000. I submit that the only question in such a case as this is whether the work is absolutely necessary; it is not a question of cost.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say in reply to the gentleman from Maine, that I am not disposed to be niggardly upon the subject of fortifications; but I do think that before gentlemen bring in here propositions for the appropriation of hundreds of thousands of dollars to begin a work, it is due to this House that they should take some steps to ascertain what it will probably cost to complete the work.

Mr. LYNCH. I would inform the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HILL] that "gentlemen" of this House did not bring this matter here. It is brought to our attention by the Government, within whose charge this matter comes. It is not proposed by any individual member of the House, but by a committee acting on the recommendation of the Secretary of War.

Mr. HILL. I beg leave to say that when I spoke of "gentlemen bringing in propositions" I did not mean to make any reflection upon the gentleman from Maine. I simply meant to refer to the persons concerned in bringing this forward, whether members of this House or connected with any other department of the Government.

Mr. PAINE. I will state for the information of the gentleman from Indiana and other members, that one very good reason why no member of the committee has presented a statement of the cost of this work is that up to this time no detailed plan and no estimate of the expense have been made by the War Department itself.

Mr. LYNCH, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. MAYNARD. I renew the amendment. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me this is an inopportune time for us to engage in building fortifications upon the sea-coast. I presume there is less possibility of war now on the part of this country or any other than at any preceding period of our history. The events of the past five years have put the whole civilized world under bonds to keep the peace toward us. I do not see there is any necessity, therefore, in expending money to complete those works already begun, much less commencing new fortifications. Moreover, sir, the art of attack and defense has undergone material and important changes during the last five years, and it is now undergoing such changes that expenditures made at this time may, in all probability, be utterly valueless. We cannot lose sight of the important fact that not a solitary work upon the southern sea-board, so far as I can recollect, except Fort Pickens, but was attacked during the late war with success by one side or the other. Forts on which we expended money almost uncounted when attacked by us or the rebels succumbed. To expend public money in building other structures like those upon our sea-board seems to me to be a waste of our means. Besides, if this particular work is as important as its friends insist, let us have an estimate; let us see the magnitude of the work and the ultimate expense so that we may judge understandingly. Such estimates can be made. There is no necessity of passing this at once. In former short sessions, when current appropriations only extended to the first of the ensuing July, there may have been such necessity, but as the next Congress will commence in time to pass the appropriation bills for the next fiscal year, I think we can leave this matter to be determined by them.

I am opposed to this whole thing, and will, at the proper time, move that the bill be laid on the table, so the whole subject may go over to the next session. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected, only twenty-five voting in the affirmative.

Mr. KASSON. I move in line three to insert the following:

For repairing and enlarging Fort Porter, at Black Rock, New York, $50,000.

For Fort Niagara, Niagara river, New York, $100,000.

For Fort Knox, Penobscot river, Maine, $75,000.

For Fort Preble, Portland harbor, Maine, $150,000.

For Fort McClary, Portsmouth, New Hampshire, $100,000.

For Fort Independence, Boston, Massachusetts, $100,000.

For two forts for the defense of Narragansett bay, Rhode Island, $100,000.

For new battery at Fort Hamilton, New York, $80,000.

For modifications of Forts La Fayette and Columbus, Castle William, South Battery, Fort Wood, and Fort Gibson, New York harbor, $300,000.

For purchase and repairs of instruments, $10,000.

Mr. Chairman, these are for works already commenced. The committee were led to suppose, by a misplacement of the estimates, that these were for new works, but as they are not they are now offered.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 27, noes 45; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN, under the rule, ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. KASSON and Mr. CONKLING.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 34, noes 65.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BERGEN. I move the following amendment, to come in after line thirty-eight:

For draining Government lands at Fort Hamilton, New York, $5,000.

Mr. Chairman, there is a large extent of land near Fort Hamilton, New York, which is swampy and unhealthy and ought to be drained. The State of New York passed a law for draining low lands at the expense of the land-holders. I submit it is as just and proper for the United States to pay for the drainage of the low lands belonging to it. These low lands give rise to fever and ague, and they ought to be drained, if for no other consideration than the preservation of the health of the garrison-always kept at Fort Hamilton.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move now to insert the other items of which I gave notice. In the present disposition of the House I will not divide them, but offer them as a whole:

For commencement of an additional fort for defense of Portsmouth harbor, New Hampshire, including purchase of site, $75,000.

For commencement of a fort on Long Island head, Boston harbor, $75,000.

For continuation of the sea-wall on Governor's Island, New York harbor, $100,000.

For commencement of a fort at Point San José, San Francisco harbor, California, $50,000.

If any gentleman desires a division of the question he can ask for a vote upon them separately. I offer them as one amendment.

Mr. SPALDING. All together.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now move an amendment of a different character, to insert the following:

For purchase of sites now occupied for temporary sea-coast defenses, provided that no such purchase shall be made except upon the approval of its expediency by the Secretary of War and of the validity of the title by the Attorney General, $25,000.

It has been developed, in the progress of the late war for the suppression of the rebellion, as an existing fact that there are several important points of defense which ought to be in the possession of the Government. They have been occupied during the war by earthworks, temporary structures. Claims for rent for the use of the premises and for damages have been sent in against the Government, to pay which will amount perhaps to as much or more than would purchase all these sites. It is therefore proposed by the War Department to have a small appropriation of $25,000 to enable the Government to purchase these sites, not with a view of constructing at these points permanent defenses hereafter in the shape of forts to be kept up, but to be used, as they have been heretofore, for the temporary construction of earthworks in case the necessity should arise for such defenses hereafter from a war with another country. There is an item in the bill for the purchase of sites for permanent sea-coast defenses which is different from this. This is a smaller appropriation for the purpose of securing these sites on favorable terms for use as mere temporary defenses.

I will send to the Clerk's desk to be read a communication on this subject made by the chief of Engineers to the Secretary of War, inclosed in a letter of the Secretary of War to myself, which will serve as the only further explanation that I propose to give on the subject:

WAR DEPARTMENT.
WASHINGTON CITY, February 4, 1867.

SIR: I have the honor to send herewith, for the consideration of the committee, a communication from the chief of Engineers of February 2, respecting an appropriation for the purchase of sites now occupied for temporary sea-coast defenses, which has the approval of this Department.

Very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

EDWIN M. STANTON,

Secretary of War.

Hon. R. C. SCHENCK, Chairman of Military Committee, House of Representatives.

ENGINEER DEPARTMENT.
WASHINGTON, February 2, 1867.

SIR: During the late war quite a number of positions on our northern coast were taken possession of and occupied with batteries of a temporary character to cover harbors against apprehended raids of rebel privateers and to afford harbors of refuge for our coasters and other vessels when pursued by the enemy. As the necessity for the immediate preparation of these works was of too pressing a character to permit of delay in negotiating with the owners of the sites for their purchase or rent, they were taken possession of under the authority of the War Department without any agreement being entered into with the owners, who now in some instances have come forward with claims for rent and damages.

It is not proposed, in most of these cases, to replace these works by permanent fortifications, but to rely, in the event of war, upon temporary structures similar to those now existing, to be prepared on the breaking out of hostilities, and as the same sites will be again needed it would be economy for the Government to purchase them and thus get rid of all claims to rent and damages, and at the same time secure the existing works from being destroyed.

One of the largest items of the cost of these works is the earthen embankment, which, if the Government owned the land, could be maintained at trifling expense. I have, therefore, the honor to recommend that application be made to Congress at its present session for an appropriation for the purchase of such sites as it may be desirable, in the opinion of the War Department, to retain. The exact amount that will be needed for the purchase of these sites has not been ascertained, but it is believed that $25,000 will be ample.

The form of appropriation might be as follows:

For purchase of sites now occupied for temporary sea-coast defenses, provided that no such purchase shall be made except upon the approval of its expediency by the Secretary of War and of the validity of the title by the Attorney General, $25,000.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
A. A. HUMPHREYS,
Chief of Engineers.

Hon. E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

Mr. MAYNARD. It seems to me this is an indirect mode of getting at a number of private claims. It seems that the Government during the war found it necessary to take possession of individual property, and this is a mode by which they can be paid without getting the action of Congress directly to pay them. We are not informed where these sites are or how much land is expected to be purchased. In other words, it is throwing the whole matter over, nominally, to the War Department, but actually to some subordinate officer, who will dispose of the public money according to his ideas of what is right between the Government and the owner of the property. That is a mode of disposing of the public money which has been found to be unsatisfactory heretofore, and I would respectfully submit to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs whether we had not better have some information before we make the appropriation. It strikes me this is a great deal like buying a pig in a poke.

Mr. SCHENCK. The argument presented by my friend is very ingenious, but it has one defect: it does not conform to the facts. That I consider rather fatal to it. He thinks this is a mode of paying private claimants. They have asked nothing of the sort. They have not even offered for sale, nor is it certain that they will sell this property. But the facts are simply these, as the gentleman would have heard if he had paid attention to my statement: these sites have been taken possession of during the war for the suppression of the rebellion. They are found to be admirably adapted to the defense of the coast in case of attack. Temporary earthworks have been constructed upon them. Those earthworks we have no right to hold. We took possession of the land in a summary way, and the land will now revert to the owners, and these earthworks, some of which are considerable and important structures, will necessarily go to decay. They will be washed down or plowed up and will disappear.

The War Department, inasmuch as they have found these to be eligible sites for these works, and as they will be the same at any other time when the country is engaged in a war, proposes to purchase the sites. The amount to be paid, as I have already remarked, will probably be less than the owner would claim for rent and damages. But the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] is mistaken in supposing that the appropriation is made for the purpose of paying these claims. The purchase is recommended because of the intrinsic value of the sites themselves for the objects of the Government in making a defense of the coast.

The gentleman is therefore mistaken, however ingenious his argument may be, in putting it upon the ground that this appropriation is designed for the payment of private claims.

Mr. STEVENS. Can the gentleman inform us where this property lies?

Mr. SCHENCK. Some of these sites are on the Delaware river, below Newcastle; some on the coast of Maryland, and some further north. A number of the most valuable are on the Delaware river, commanding bends of that river and the approaches to Philadelphia. It is not intended that there shall be fortifications there, and they will probably never be used in that way. It is simply intended to secure them for the purposes of defense in some way hereafter by making this purchase and taking care of the fortifications now constructed, and to prevent them from being washed away and disappearing, as they will if the land passes back to the owners of the property.

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not wish to act under a misapprehension of facts, nor do I desire to do any injustice. Can the gentleman tell us whether these parties have already received any compensation?

Mr. SCHENCK. I think not. There were some cases where the ground was occupied under a contract either express or implied, and where the Quartermaster General has settled with the parties; but as a general rule the claims are still outstanding.

Mr. MAYNARD. Does the gentleman suppose that these claims will not at some time be presented either here or at the War Department?

Mr. SCHENCK. I think they will; indeed, I think some of them have been presented now, but I think this will be a summary way of getting rid of them. I am willing that the gentleman shall move an amendment saying that this payment shall be held to exclude all such claims.

Mr. MAYNARD. I think it would be a very summary mode of disposing of these cases. I suppose there are thousands of cases all over the country where it has been found necessary to build forts at very great expense, and where the necessary land has been taken, and in some instances where very valuable houses have been destroyed. And I suspect that the owners of such property, who find themselves unexpectedly the owners of forts, will come to the War Department and urge their claims for damages.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I rise to what I believe to be a privileged motion: I move to strike out the enacting words of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not in order in Committee of the Whole; it must be made in the House.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I trust the Chair will reconsider the decision. I understand that a motion to strike out the enacting clause is always in order in Committee of the Whole, and that if it prevail it has the effect of defeating the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. It can only be made after the committee has gone through with the bill. The committee is now engaged in perfecting the bill by claims.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to offer an amendment to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Upon further reflection the Chair is of opinion that the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTFIELD] to strike out the enacting words of the bill is in order.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I will withdraw my motion long enough to allow the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] to offer his amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I suppose the pending amendment must first be disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment already pending, offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.] When that amendment shall have been disposed of, the question will be taken upon the motion to strike out the enacting words of the bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend the amendment by adding $1,000 to the appropriation. I do so for the purpose of saying in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] who persists in the idea that this is a scheme for paying claimants, that I want him to understand that this appropriation is proposed simply because these sites are held by the Government to be valuable for purposes of the Government. The gentleman complains that there are persons in Tennessee and elsewhere, who have had their farms occupied for forts, who are presenting claims which will not be paid in this way. Now, I propose this to the gentleman in order to compromise our differences; I aver that it is necessary along the coast to secure the sites that have been occupied during this war by the Government, with a view to a war with a foreign country; and that to say the least of it there is a possibility of our having a war with some other country. Now, if the gentleman will rise in his place here and say that he believes it is equally important for the Government to keep and hold the sites for forts in Tennessee and elsewhere, because he apprehends the secessionists will undertake to fight the Government again, perhaps I may go with him to hold those sites. But I do not believe the secessionists will again fight, and therefore I do not believe it is necessary to secure those sites to enable the country the better to carry on war against another rebellion. I believe we may have war with a foreign Government, but never again with rebels.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will rise in my place and say that I concur with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] in the belief that there is no necessity for keeping forts in the interior with a view to another rebellion. I also believe there is precisely as much necessity for keeping them for that purpose as for keeping these earthworks on the Atlantic coast in view of a war with any foreign nation.

Mr. SCHENCK. There seems, then, to be only a difference of opinion between us in regard to whether we may or may not have a foreign war. I do not suppose there can be any difference of opinion between us in regard to another rebellion.

I now withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. SCHENCK, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I now move to strike out the enacting clause of this bill, in order to test the sense of this committee upon the merits of this bill. For myself I have come to the conclusion, after hearing the bill discussed somewhat, that neither the convenience of the country nor the wants of the country demand the large expenditure of money which is contemplated by this bill.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SCOFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL. I am opposed to the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania for the reason that I desire to offer the following amendment to this bill:

Provided, That not more than one half of the several sums herein appropriated shall be expended during the year ending June 30, 1868.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I would inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he insists upon his motion to strike out the enacting clause of this bill?

Mr. SCOFIELD. Certainly; I insist upon my motion.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Then no amendment is in order.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to oppose the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania because I wish to offer the amendment I have read. We have already rejected appropriations as meritorious as any contained in this bill. If any bill for fortifications should pass, clearly those items of appropriation which have been omitted from this bill should be included. My own judgment is that we should reduce the whole appropriations one half at least. I understand that the amounts named in the bill are not less than $3,000,000. Now, I am unwilling that we shall entirely suspend these operations where work has already been commenced, and where it would be about as expensive for the Government to take care of them and repair damages as to go on and complete them. I hope that the House will come to the conclusion to appropriate for expenditure during the next fiscal year one half of the amounts proposed by the Committee on Appropriations and recommended by the War Department.

I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] the remainder of my time.

Mr. KASSON. I want to suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] that he withhold his motion till the bill has been gone through with and perfected, so far as we may be able to do it by amendments. With the bill in that condition I think his motion could be voted upon much more satisfactorily.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I think we may as well test at this time as any other the sense of the House upon this bill. If the bill embraces some meritorious features, as the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] seems to think, these should have been carefully sifted out by the committee and embraced in a bill by themselves. The committee can, if it deem proper, report them in a future bill. I believe that this bill as a whole will, if passed, involve a wasteful expenditure of the public money not justified by the present condition of our finances.

Mr. KASSON. One million nine hundred and sixty thousand dollars, nearly two million dollars, of the appropriations estimated for and recommended by the Departments are not embraced in this bill. The bill as reported by the Committee on Appropriations does not embrace one half of the estimates.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I suppose, Mr. Chairman, that a bill so long as this cannot be entirely bad; but taken in the aggregate it seems to me to involve such large and unjustifiable expenditures that I desire to test the sense of the House upon it at this time.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the Chair please state the effect of the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

The CHAIRMAN. Rule 123 states that—

"Whenever a bill is reported from a Committee of the Whole, with a recommendation to strike out the enacting words, and such recommendation is disagreed to by the House, the bill shall stand re-committed to the said committee without further action by the House."

If the recommendation is agreed to by the House, then the bill is defeated.

On agreeing to the motion of Mr. SCOFIELD, to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, there were—ayes 58, noes 40.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill No. 919, making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1868, and had directed him to report the same with a recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and resume the consideration of the President's message. There are several gentlemen who have been waiting for some time an opportunity to deliver speeches.

Mr. HILL. I move that the House adjourn.

On the motion there were—ayes 58, noes 45.

Mr. MORRILL called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered: and Messrs. MORRILL and SPALDING were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes fifty-nine, noes not counted.

So the motion was agreed to; and the House (at four o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) adjourned.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

The following notice for leave to introduce a bill was given under the rule:

By Mr. O'NEILL: A supplement to an act entitled "An act to equalize bounties," approved July 23, 1866, and also to provide for a bounty to seamen, firemen, and coal-passers.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 5, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. T. R. HOWLETT, of Washington, District of Columbia.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating, in obedience to a resolution of the Senate of the 30th of January, information in relation to the late massacre of United States troops by Indians at or near Fort Phil. Kearney, in Dakota Territory.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move that that communication and accompanying documents be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest that a similar communication from the Secretary of War has been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HENDERSON. It should have gone to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. WILSON. If that be the case I move that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HENDERSON. Let them both be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made if there be no objection.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WILSON presented two petitions of officers of the Army and Marine corps of the United States, praying for an increase of their pay by restoring the commutation of the Army ration to fifty cents; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented a petition of officers of the United States Army, praying for an increase of pay; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. MORGAN presented a petition of citizens of the county of Orange, State of New York, who were formerly enlisted men of the Ordnance corps, praying that they may be included in the act of Congress providing for additional bounty; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. FOWLER presented the petition of James Fulton, paymaster United States Navy, praying to be relieved from all responsibility for a deficiency in the clothing and small-store account of the "inspection," discovered in October, 1866, the same having been stolen by the clerk of the "inspection," which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SUMNER. I present twenty-eight different petitions from citizens of North Carolina, white and black, in which they ask Congress, by its law-making power, to establish a loyal civil government in North Carolina; one that shall be on a thoroughly loyal basis, so that North Carolina may be restored to her place in the Union. I ask that these twenty-eight petitions, numerous signed, be referred to the joint Committee on Reconstruction.

They were so referred.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present a petition signed by nearly all the members of the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, praying that a specific duty of one dollar per gallon may be levied on imported wine. They state at length the great progress that has been made in the cultivation of the grape and the manufacture of wine in the United States, and they claim that a specific duty such as they propose would afford a sufficient revenue to the Government and give a much-needed protection to this new and valuable branch of American industry, and that in a short time it would enable the domestic wine to supersede the foreign article. As this subject has been disposed of in the Senate for the present I move that this petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER presented the petition of James C. Darragh, formerly second lieutenant company K, ninth Michigan cavalry volunteers, praying for an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a resolution adopted at a meeting of the manufacturers and others interested, in the city of Detroit, on the 25th of January, 1867, in favor of a removal of the five per cent. revenue tax imposed on manufacturers; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. JOHNSON presented a memorial of citizens of Little Rock, Arkansas, representing that a large amount of property in that city was sold in May, 1865, for the non-payment of the United States direct tax, and remonstrating against the passage of any law designed to remedy the defects in the sale; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RESOLUTIONS OF MICHIGAN.

Mr. CHANDLER presented the following concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of Michigan; which were read and ordered to lie on the table, and be printed:

Resolved, by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That the action of the Congress of the United States in promptly passing over the President's veto the bill annulling all distinction on account of color in the exercise of the elective franchise in the District of Columbia merits and receives the hearty and unqualified approval of this Legislature.

Resolved, (the Senate concurring.) That the Clerk of this House cause a copy of the foregoing resolution to be forwarded to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 843) for the relief of Rufus C. Spalding, paymaster in the United States Navy, reported it without amendment.

Harper, children and heirs-at-law of the late John Harper, deceased, praying for compensation for the use and occupation of their land by the United States Government, in the county of Norfolk and State of Virginia, for hospital and navy-yard purposes, submitted an adverse report, and asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject; which was agreed to.

Coxe, and protect them in their pursuits while carrying out the objects of the association, reported in favor of printing the memorial.

Mr. VAN WINKLE, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the petition of Jacob Shavor and Albert C. Corse, praying for compensation for past use and purchase of an invention for post-marking and cancellation of postage stamps on letters-patent by and patented to Marcus P. Norton, of Troy, New York, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads; which was agreed to.

HENRY E. MORSE.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 538) for the relief of the widow and children of Henry E. Morse, to report it back with a recommendation that it pass, and as it is a bill making provision for a very destitute widow, I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Mrs. Marion W. Morse, widow of Henry E. Morse, late a private of company G, ninth Vermont volunteers, on the pension-roll at the rate of eight dollars per month, to commence September 23, 1863, and also to allow to their minor children under sixteen years of age the amount given by law to the minor children of widows entitled to pensions.

No. 567) to authorize and provide for the construction of a military and postal road from Galveston, in the State of Texas, to Fort Gibson, in the Indian Territory, with a branch to Little Rock, in Arkansas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

TRAINS ON THE OVERLAND ROUTE.

Mr. MORRILL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to the Senate whether any order has been issued by Lieutenant General Sherman in regard to the protection of trains on the overland route, so called, and if so, what.

CHARLESTOWN NAVY-YARD.

Mr. SUMNER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the recent transactions at the navy-yard at Charlestown, and especially to ascertain if, through negligence or design, any ship has been sent to sea or is now about to be sent to sea with rotten planks or timbers, so as to endanger its safety.

SOLDIERS' DISCHARGE PAPERS.

Mr. KIRKWOOD submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

CLAIMS IN INSURRECTIONARY STATES.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 902.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 902) to declare the sense of an act entitled "An act to restrict the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, and to provide for the payment of certain demands for quartermasters' stores and subsistence supplies furnished to the Army of the United States."

It proposes that the provisions of chapter two hundred and forty of the acts of the Thirty-Eighth Congress, first session, approved July 4, 1864, shall not be construed to authorize the settlement of any claim for supplies or stores taken or furnished for the use of, or used by the armies of the United States, nor for the occupation of or injury to real estate, nor for the consumption, appropriation, or destruction of or damage to personal property by the military authorities or troops of the United States, where such claim originated during the war for the suppression of the southern rebellion in a State declared in insurrection by a proclamation of the President of the United States, or in a State which by an ordinance of secession attempted to withdraw from the United States Government; but nothing herein contained is to repeal or modify the effect of the joint resolution of Congress passed July 28, 1866, extending the provisions of the act of July 4, 1864, to the loyal citizens of the State of Tennessee.

The Committee on the Judiciary reported the bill with various amendments. The first amendment was in line thirteen, after the word "State," to insert "or part of a State;" so as to read "in a State or part of a State declared in insurrection."

Mr. HOWE. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Illinois whether a better form of expression would not be, "in a State which or any part of which was declared to be in rebellion."

Mr. TRUMBULL. We follow the language heretofore used.

Mr. HOWE. Very well; I will not urge the point just now.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line fourteen, to strike out "a" and insert "the," and in line fifteen to insert "dated July 1, 1862;" so as to read, "declared in insurrection by the proclamation of the President dated July 1, 1862."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. The bill as it originally stood excluded from compensation all persons whose property may have been taken by the Army, although they were residing in and the property was located in that portion of a State or States which was not declared to be in rebellion by the proclamation specifically mentioned in the amendment just adopted by the Senate. There were other proclamations subsequent to that. I forget the date of the second proclamation; but I know that there was one, and perhaps more than one, subsequent to the specified proclamation of 1862. I forget the date of the occupation by the United States of New Orleans and the surrounding territory, but I think it was some time after the particular proclamation, and from the time that was acquired the authority of the United States was never for a moment disturbed within the limits of that military occupation.

Now, I suggest to the honorable member from Illinois, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, and to the Senate, why it would not be just and right to secure to loyal citizens of Louisiana who were within the military occupation of that State by the United States, and whose property was taken for the United States, the benefit of this bill. If it be right to give the benefit of the bill to those who were occupying a part of a State not embraced in the rebellion, by force of the proclamation of July 1, 1862, I cannot see why it is not equally right to give the benefit of the bill to those who were within the military occupation which the United States obtained in Louisiana, being loyal, and who may more or less have contributed to the military occupation or the retention of it, whose property may have been taken subsequently for the use of the United States. I have reason to know that there were in New Orleans and the immediate surrounding country a great many men who were really loyal, many more than the country is now aware of, who looked with the greatest solicitude to the coming of the troops of the United States, and who rejoiced when that event occurred, not for a moment forgetting the allegiance they owed the United States or their love of the institutions of the General Government. Now, to say that their property which was taken by the United States for the benefit of their troops after that period is not to be paid for seems to me to be as unjust as it would be to say that the property of those who happen to be in a portion of a State not included within the proclamation of the President of July 1, 1862, should not have the benefit of the law.

The principle upon which the provision stands is that the property of a loyal citizen which has been used by the United States is to be paid for, provided only that he does not happen unfortunately to be within the limits of a State the whole of which was declared to be in rebellion. I propose, therefore, to amend the bill by inserting between the fifteenth and sixteenth lines these words: "or which at the time the property was taken was within the military occupation of the United States and so remained to the close of the war."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Maryland that there are other amendments of the committee not yet passed upon.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will postpone my amendment until they are passed upon.

The Secretary read the next amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary, which was in lines nineteen and twenty to strike out the words "the joint resolution of Congress passed July 28, 1866," and insert "any act or joint resolution;" so as to read:

That nothing herein contained shall repeal or modify the effect of any act or joint resolution extending the provisions of the said act of July 4, 1864, to the loyal citizens of the State of Tennessee.

Mr. FOWLER. Do I understand that the committee propose to strike out the provision as to the joint resolution of July 28, 1866?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposes to strike out certain words and insert other words in lieu of them.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will state to the Senator from Tennessee that it leaves the joint resolution in relation to Tennessee in full operation.

Mr. FOWLER. That is all I wished to know.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It only alters the language so as to bring in West Virginia, too.

Mr. FOWLER. I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was to insert after "Tennessee" at the end of the bill the words "or of the State of West Virginia or any county therein."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments reported by the committee having been disposed of, the question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. JOHNSON. My amendment is to insert after "1862," in line fifteen, the words "or which at the time the property was taken was within the military occupation of the United States and so remained to the close of the war."

Mr. TRUMBULL. I trust that amendment will not be adopted. It will open the Treasury to claims all over the southern country where our armies were in possession. They were in possession of different portions of the country during that whole period, and it would be very difficult to determine precisely what was within our lines. The whole object of this bill is to declare the sense of an act already in existence. The Quartermaster General and Commissary General have already put a construction upon that act, and they have decided in both departments that no claims could be allowed against the Government for quartermasters' or commissary stores which originated in States in insurrection against the Government. That is their decision, but claimants in rebellious States are not satisfied with the decision; they are instituting appeals and constantly pressing claims of persons in the rebellious States who claim to be loyal citizens. When the Congress of the United States passed that act it was intended to confine it to claims originating in the loyal States. That, I think, is the legitimate meaning of the act, and in my judgment the Commissary General and the Quartermaster General have placed the proper construction upon it; but there is some question about it; or at least lawyers employed by claim agents make questions, and they are appealing to the War Department and appealing to the President to put a different construction upon the act. It is to settle that question and to prevent a different construction which should open the Treasury to claims all over the United States that this bill, which originated in the House, is now proposed to be passed.

Now, what does the Senator from Maryland propose to do? He proposes to enlarge that act. I shall enter into no argument with the Senator from Maryland as to the propriety of paying the just claims for commissary and quartermasters' stores which were taken by our Army and used when they were taken from loyal citizens. The Senator knows that I advocated at the last session of Congress the passage of a bill, under proper restrictions, that would allow such persons to be paid through the Court of Claims; but the Senate was unwilling to pass it, even restricted and guarded as the bill was which the Committee on the Judiciary reported at that time. The Senate was unwilling to pass it, and did not pass it. While the present law exists I think it should receive the construction which has been placed upon it by the officers of the Government who are charged with its execution, and in order to make that certain this bill was proposed. Now, the Senator from Maryland offers a proposition which would open the Treasury to any claim which might be presented from any portion of the rebellious States which was within the lines of our Army and so continued till the end of the war. I think it will be very dangerous to allow such claims to be brought in. It ought not to be done in this bill at any rate. Let us provide for these claims, not only in those localities, but everywhere else, if we can, in the general bill which is proposed for that purpose. I trust the Senate will not adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. JOHNSON. I was aware that the honorable member was in favor of paying all claims of this description made by men who were loyal at the time the claims originated, and I supposed because he was in favor of that principle that he would not object to the amendment which I suggest. Now, as I understand the action of the commissary and quartermaster's departments, independent of what the honorable member states, they have held that under the act which this bill proposes to explain and construe no claim of a loyal citizen could be paid if his State as a State was declared to be in rebellion by the President's proclamation. This bill does not confirm that ruling, if I understand it. They supposed that excepting from the proclamation declaring a State to be in insurrection any portion of the State still left the claimant without remedy, because the parts excepted were a part of the State declared to be in rebellion. Now, this bill provides that claims due to persons that were residing in a part of a State excepted from the proclamation of insurrection did not fall at all within the true meaning of the original act. The Senate, I am sure, are aware that in the very proclamation referred to specifically in the amendment of the Judiciary Committee to this bill various counties in Virginia were excepted from the operation of the proclamation.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Not one that is not in West Virginia.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes; the whole of West Virginia; and the Senate will remember that under the act of 1861 the President was authorized to declare, not a State in insurrection merely, but a State if the whole was in insurrection, or such part of a State as might be in insurrection, excluding such parts as he supposed were not in that condition from the scope of his proclamation; the result of which necessarily was that with reference to such parts their citizens stood as they would have stood if there had been no proclamation declaring the State to be in insurrection. That being the case, the only question is whether the provision which I propose to incorporate in this bill does not stand precisely upon the same ground.

The honorable member tells us that it may let in a vast variety of claims, which it would be very difficult for the United States to disprove by disproving the facts upon which they are to rest, the facts being that those portions of the State in the military occupation of the United States were so in the military occupation, and that the parties themselves were loyal. That applies just as well to the portions of the States excepted from the proclamation; that is to say, you are to ascertain what portions of a State are excepted; and then you are to ascertain what in point of fact was the condition of the claimant; was he or was he not loyal; for it is not to be disguised that in the parts of States which were excepted, in West Virginia, for example, as we heard from my friend, one of the Senators from West Virginia, [Mr. WILLEY,] the other day, there were a great many of their citizens who were not loyal, but very disloyal, as I understood him to say, and as I believe the history of the contest proved. They aided the rebellion as much as they could.

Now, the amendment which I propose does not say that claims of this description which arise in any portion of a State which at any time may have been in the military occupation of the United States are to be entitled to be covered by the provisions of the bill, but that any part of a State which came under the military occupation of the United States and so remained up to the close of the war should not be included in the provisions of the original bill.

I have said enough to explain the ground upon which I suppose the amendment ought to receive the sanction of the Senate, and am very willing, of course, that the Senate should dispose of it as they may think proper.

Mr. SAULSBURY. However unwisely that portion of the people of the South who desired a separation from the Federal Union may have acted, if this bill becomes a law it will be difficult to escape the conviction that that portion of them who adhered to the fortunes of the Federal Union did not act more unwisely. And why do I say so? I say so because this bill is in contravention of every promise and pledge made by the Federal Government to that portion of the people of the South who continued their fidelity to the Federal Union. What was the basis of their duty to the Federal Union? It was that if they rendered to you allegiance you should afford to them protection; and from the beginning of this war up to its close your uniform promise to that class of people was that you would if they adhered to you afford them protection. Now, sir, hundreds and thousands of them, as you yourselves admit, did, consistently from the inception of the war to its termination remain what you call loyal. I ask you, sir, in what better situation ought a Union man in the State of Massachusetts to stand than a Union man in South Carolina or Mississippi? If you compensate for damages done to the property of a Union man in a non-seceding State, a State not declared by your proclamations to be in rebellion, upon what principle do you deny compensation to equally as good a Union man wherever he may be located? Why, sir, had you proclaimed in the inception of this war to the people of the South, those people of the South, I mean, who adhered steadfastly to the Federal Union, that you would not at the termination of the war redress any grievance they might have endured or any wrongs they might have suffered, how many Union-men do you suppose you would have had in the South? Not a corporal's guard; and if you had had no Union men in the South, had that people been united heart and soul every man of them, instead of your flags floating over every State in the South it would have floated nowhere in the South.

Then, sir, I protest against this act by Congress as a gross wrong done to that portion of the people of the South who continued their fidelity to the Federal Union. You are drawing a distinction between what you call Union men in one section of the country and in one State of the Union and those persons of a like character residing in a different section and in a different State. Such a principle is unjust. It should have no recognition here; it is contrary to your promises and pledges made during the continuance of the war.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I am entirely convinced that the sooner we investigate and determine claims connected with the late war and growing out of it the better for the Treasury; that upon pure business principles of public administration, instead of pushing claims away from us, pushing them out of sight, delaying them, refusing to examine them ourselves or to have them examined by any competent authority, we should proceed promptly to determine the principles upon which the Government will make payment for claims connected with the late war; and having established those principles we should proceed to investigate all cases and determine them. I am entirely convinced in my own mind that by delaying the investigation and decision of these claims we shall eventually pay two or three times as much as we would now, and probably we shall make payment at a time when by reason of a contracted currency and of other circumstances the burden will be practically greater upon the Treasury than it would be now if we met these cases.

Then, sir, there is another consideration. By the lapse of time that evidence on behalf of the Government which is now attainable will be destroyed or lost. These claims will grow stronger, however, so far as the affirmative is concerned when they are presented to us. The claimants will carefully preserve all the evidence in their own favor; and some years hence, when they come forward before Congress or before the Court of Claims, they will be able to make out an irresistible argument in favor of their demands, whereas evidence on the part of the Government will be lost. Men who know anything about a particular transaction now might be called upon to testify in behalf of the Government; but those men will have died, they will be dispersed. Men connected with your military service who are still within reach, who can now enlighten you upon the subject of these claims, will be dispersed all over the country, to the Pacific coast, to remote States of the North, and you will be unable to obtain that evidence which is necessary to defend the Government and to defend the Treasury against unjust or inflated claims hereafter.

Therefore, sir, in my opinion, upon pure business principles, it is the policy of the Government to meet this whole subject at once, to meet it promptly. I am not in favor of paying doubtful claims; much less am I in favor of paying stale claims; but I know how it is in all legislative bodies composed of men who have human sympathies and who are appealed to by claimants, in many cases I think successfully, when claims ought to be resisted; and I apprehend danger to the Treasury, danger to the public interests from this policy of pushing away from us these cases, refusing to look at them now while they are fresh and while we can command the whole subject and view it in an intelligent manner and settle proper rules, deferring the evil day, pushing it away from us and leaving to future years the investigation and decision of these cases. For my part, I am for meeting all just responsibilities of the Government at this time, for establishing rigid rules of exclusion to shut out fraudulent and evil claims from the Treasury; establishing some rules now, before Congress is appealed to in individual cases, and gives way step after step until the Treasury shall eventually be loaded down with enormous masses of claims, which if met now would be rejected, and rejected forever.

Mr. WILSON. I have opposed the payment of these claims when they have been brought up here, and opposed the bill which was before us at the last session of Congress. I agree with what has been said by the Senator from Pennsylvania, and have prepared a measure which I intend to move as an amendment to the bill which was before us at the last session whenever it shall come up. That proposition, which I have drawn up provides for the appointment of a commission for each one of these States to make the examination now, under prescribed rules and regulations, and lay the facts before Congress and the country. I hope such action will be taken, for I agree that that is a question which we should meet, and meet now, so as to know precisely what we have got to do, for as time goes on these claims will increase.

This, however, is simply a measure to prevent money being paid out until we have some general policy. I hope, therefore, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland will not be adopted, and that no money will be paid out in the rebel States for these claims at present, but that Congress will adopt a general plan by which we can do justice to the really loyal men in that section of country and prevent the millions of frauds that will be attempted.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate, as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in. It was ordered that the amendments be engrossed and the bill read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Upon the passage of the bill I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The bill was passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the Chair.) The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the bankrupt bill.

Mr. WADE. I move to postpone that bill and all prior orders, and proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States imposing a restriction upon the presidential term.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let us finish the bankrupt bill first.

Mr. WADE. We shall never finish it as we are going on.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think we can finish it to-day.

Mr. POLAND. I hope this motion will not prevail. I think in all fairness I am entitled to have the bill now before the Senate considered and finished. I think the Constitution will keep for one day longer.

Mr. WADE. I suppose the Constitution will keep a good many days just as it is, but I do not think it is the best way to have it continued. Now this bankrupt bill has passed the House; it is here, and can probably be finished, though I do not know about that. Yesterday we were all day upon it, and I believe took no votes upon it at all, and I do not suppose we shall to-day, for the ingenuity of men can invent as many fancies over a bill as they please, and they debate each one for a day and no progress is made. But as it is a measure that has passed the House, there is no doubt about its passage here at some time during the session; it probably will be finished when the time comes that we cannot talk any longer upon it. The joint resolution which I propose to take up, however, has got to pass both bodies, if it is to be acted upon at this session. I do not believe, from what I understand by conversing with many members, that it will lead to very much delay or debate. I believe it meets the approbation of almost every Senator, and has no relation to any party matter whatever. I am very anxious to have it taken up and passed upon now, because most, if not all of the State Legislatures are in session, and if we delay it for other business they will have adjourned and the thing will have to lie along a great while. I hope the Senate will consent to take it up and pass it without debate. I promise myself to make no speech about it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I really hope that this bankrupt bill will not be interfered with. We have had it under consideration for several days and have now almost got through with it. When the Senator says that we made no progress yesterday I think he is mistaken. I think there was a great deal of progress made. We acted on all the remaining amendments of the committee and took several votes, but did not quite finish the bill. I think it may be finished to-day. In my opinion it is very poor policy to follow up a measure almost to completion and then drop it for some new measure, which will undoubtedly create considerable discussion. As to the State Legislatures, they will be in session longer than we shall, undoubtedly. They sit ordinarily later than the 4th of March, so that there will be time enough to act on this other question. But my great objection is in regard to the mode of doing business. We had better finish one thing at a time, especially when an important measure is under consideration. I hope we shall finish the bankrupt bill, and then I shall have no objection to proceeding with the other measure.

Mr. WADE. I am perfectly satisfied that if we do not take up this joint resolution now the Senator will come in in a day or two with his financial measures, that every thing else must give place to, of course, and in my opinion if we do not take it up now it will get the go-by.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not think so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to postpone the bankrupt bill and all prior orders, and take up Senate joint resolution No. 33, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. WADE. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SUMNER. As the yeas and nays are ordered, I desire to make one remark. I am as earnest for the proposition of the Senator from Ohio as he can be. It ought to be adopted, and I do not allow myself to doubt that it will be adopted. But I agree with the Senator from Maine. We are already launched in one important business; let us get through with it. I think we can go through with it to-day. Let us finish the bankrupt bill, and then take up the proposition of the Senator from Ohio.

There is another reason why we should proceed with the bankrupt bill in preference to the proposition of the Senator from Ohio. A constitutional amendment does not need the signature of the President of the United States. We may, therefore, act upon that proposition even down to the last day, whereas an act of legislation does require the signature of the President. There is a difference between the two cases.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I desire to say that I will vote on some other occasion to take up this resolution. Yesterday, however, when we adjourned, it was understood among members that to-day was to be given to the Senator from Vermont for the conclusion of his bill. I consider myself, having acquiesced then, bound in good faith to stand by that understanding. To-morrow, or any other occasion when it is proper, I will vote with the Senator from Ohio to take up his resolution. I think it is a very important and very interesting measure, and I desire to propose some additional provisions to it, for which, when the time arrives, I shall ask the attention and discussion of the Senate.

Mr. WADE. If the friends of the joint resolution think that it had better go over I shall not quarrel with them about it; and if I may be permitted to do so I will withdraw the call for the yeas and nays, and also the motion to take it up; but I give notice that I shall press it to-morrow if this bankrupt bill is out of the way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion can be withdrawn by the unanimous consent of the Senate. The Chair hears no objection, and the motion is withdrawn.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolutions, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

BANKRUPT BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 598) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. HENDRICKS to strike out the proviso to the thirty-seventh section.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I understand that the Senator having the bankrupt bill in charge desires to amend the proviso which I moved to strike out yesterday evening, and with the permission of the Senate, in order to allow him to move his amendment, I will withdraw the motion which I made to strike out the proviso.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Indiana is withdrawn.

Mr. POLAND. I will move an amendment to this thirty-seventh section, which I think will obviate the objection which was made by the Senator from Indiana, and also the objection of the Senator from Michigan, to this section. I propose to amend the section in the second line by inserting after the word "all" the words "moneyed and business" so that it will read:

That the provisions of this act shall apply to all moneyed and business corporations and joint-stock companies, &c.

Mr. HOWARD. Let me suggest as a substitute for the word "business" the word "commercial." It seems to me that the word "business" is a little more comprehensive than the word "commercial," and may be construed to include all corporations to carry on any kind of business, even the business of distributing charities or the business of employing teachers in schools, or of conducting religious exercises. Certainly the Senator from Vermont does not design to include such corporations. I wish to remove as far as possible all chance for caviling interpretations of the statute, all doubt and uncertainty. I merely make the suggestion to him. I think the word "commercial" would be preferable to the word "business."

Mr. POLAND. I desire to obtain precisely the same result by this amendment that the Senator from Michigan desires, if we can only agree upon the exact word. My amendment proposes to limit this section to moneyed and business corporations, and the Senator from Michigan proposes the word "commercial" instead of the word "business."

Mr. HOWARD. Then I will suggest to the Senator to add the word "commercial," so that it will read, "moneyed, business, or commercial corporations."

Mr. POLAND. I accept that.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I now propose to amend the proviso to this thirty-seventh section by striking out in lines twenty-seven, twenty-eight, and twenty-nine the following words:

Such decrees of bankruptcy shall work a forfeiture of all the franchises of such corporation, and the affairs of such corporation shall be wound up.

And inserting in lieu thereof:

All its property and assets shall be distributed to the creditors of such corporation.

So that the proviso will read:

Provided, That whenever any corporation, by proceedings under this act, shall be declared bankrupt, all its property and assets shall be distributed to the creditors of such corporation in the manner provided in this act in respect to natural persons.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. I made a motion yesterday to strike out the whole of this section, upon which I believe no vote has been taken. For the reasons which I gave yesterday I entertain very strong doubts of the constitutionality of the whole section; in other words I entertain doubts as to the applicability of the bankrupt power in the Constitution to State corporations, and in order to test the sense of the Senate upon that, to me, very grave question, I hope the vote will be taken on my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Michigan to strike out the thirty-seventh section of the bill.

Mr. HOWARD. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. POLAND. I do not desire to take up any time in arguing this constitutional question. Under the provision of the Constitution authorizing Congress to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy, I understand that they are invested with power over the relation of debtor and creditor to the fullest extent; and that, although these corporations are artificial persons, created by laws of the State, the relations of debtor and creditor that they hold with other persons are as much within the jurisdiction and within the power of Congress in the establishment of a bankrupt law as the relations of any other class of creditors and debtors; and I think it is very essential, in order to the well-working of any bankrupt system that it should include this class of persons, debtors and creditors, as much as any other class.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 9, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Davis, Fogg, Fowler, Howard, Norton, Saulsbury, and Yates—9.
NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Kirkwood, Morgan, Morrill, Patterson, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—23.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Conness, Cowan, Cragin, Creswell, Dixon, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Guthrie, Howe, Lane, McDougall, Nesmith, Nye, Riddle, Sherman, Sprague, and Van Winkle—20.

So the motion to strike out did not prevail.

Mr. FOGG. I move to amend the bill on page 15, section thirteen, line five, by inserting after the word "value" the words "and in number," and by striking out all after the word "debts" in the sixth line to the end of the tenth line, in these words:

Provided, That when the number of creditors present amounts to five and less than ten, the votes of two, at least, shall be necessary for a choice, and when the number of creditors amounts to ten or more, the votes of three, at least, shall be necessary for a choice.

So that the section will read:

That the creditors shall, at the first meeting held, after due notice from the messenger, in presence of a register designated by the court, choose one or more assignees of the estate of the debtor, the choice to be made by the greater part in value and in number of the creditors who have proved their debts, &c.

Mr. POLAND. I hope that amendment will not prevail. The choice might be controlled by a number of creditors whose debts in the aggregate amounted to but a very small sum. Their interest might be but one tenth of the interest that was held by the minority. It appears to me that the control of the appointment of the assignee should be regulated by the amount of interest. This is the principle that applies in all corporations in voting, in electing officers, in controlling corporations by a stock vote; and it should be so in reference to the control of these proceedings. So far as the control is given to creditors, it should be regulated by the amount of their interest, and not by the number of persons in whom those interests are divided.

Mr. FOGG. The honorable Senator, I think, does not understand the effect of the amendment which I propose. The amendment is that this choice shall be made by the greater part in value and number, which requires that the majority in number of the creditors shall also represent a majority in value of the debts. I offer the amendment because I think under many circumstances two creditors might come in and overslaugh the great number of creditors. There will be no difficulty if there should be a failure to choose, because the remainder of the section provides for that very contingency. I do not expect to be able to vote for the bill, but I wish, if the bill does pass, that it shall be as unobjectionable to the people of this country as possible.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the Senator be kind enough to say how it changes the section? I do not understand it.

Mr. FOGG. As the bill now stands when only five creditors are present, two representing a majority of the debts in value may choose the assignee, and if there are not over ten present, three representing a majority of the debts may choose the assignee.

Mr. JOHNSON. What do you propose?

Mr. FOGG. I propose in the choice of an assignee to require the concurrence of a majority in value of the debts and a majority in number of the creditors; that is, a majority of the creditors representing a majority of the debts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FOGG. I offer another amendment, to add at the end of the thirty-second section the following proviso:

Provided, That in relation to all debts contracted and existing prior to the passage of this act no discharge shall be granted or be valid unless with the assent in writing of three fourths of the creditors of the bankrupt who have proved claims in the court having jurisdiction of the proceedings.

Mr. JOHNSON. The principle of that amendment has, I think, been discarded by almost every State in the Union. The provision which it proposes to make was found in nearly all the original insolvent systems, (and they were bankrupt laws in point of effect;) but experience was supposed to have proved that it operated very unjustly against the insolvent, and that it warred with a principle which would seem properly to be of universal application, that no man should be a judge in his own case. It places the debtor in the hands of his creditor. It makes the creditor the judge whether the debtor shall be discharged or not, instead of making a disinterested tribunal the judge.

I do not think that I am in error in the fact which I have stated, that it is not now to be found in many, if in any, of the States of the Union. The provision is, if I understand it as read from the desk, that no man is to be discharged under this law except with the assent of three fourths of his creditors; that is as much as to say that three fourths of his creditors are to decide—

Mr. FOGG. The provision is in relation to debts contracted before the passage of this act.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understand it; that three fourths of the creditors are to decide whether the bankrupt shall have a discharge from his debts. Now, the honorable member, as I judge from the particular phrase he has adopted in the amendment and from his calling my attention to it now, supposes that there is a distinction between cases of bankruptcies already existing and those which may subsequently arise; or rather, to speak according to the tenor of the amendment, between debts now contracted and debts which shall hereafter be contracted. The principal object of this bill is to provide for existing bankruptcies. If it be indiscreet or wrong in principle to subject a subsequently occurring bankruptcy, because of debts which may be contracted hereafter, when the law shall have passed, to the restraints of such a provision, it is equally improper, as I respectfully submit to the honorable member from New Hampshire, to make it depend at all upon the will of creditors whether the party is to have his discharge or not.

Mr. FOGG. As I said before, I do not expect to be able to vote for this bill, because I do not believe that any considerable portion of my constituents favor it. As was stated yesterday, it has been the fate of the two bankrupt bills that have existed heretofore in this country to have been vastly unpopular with the people. It has been their fate to be early repealed; in one case to have been repealed by the very Congress that enacted it; and to all who remember the operations of that bill I believe the very memory of it among the masses of the people is as odious as any act that ever stood upon the statutes of the American Congress. This bill is only demanded, I believe, by a small portion of the American people. It is only demanded, and I believe will only be tolerated, in a commercial community. Among the masses of the yeomanry of the country, among the farmers of the country, among the mechanics of the country, among the men who earn their bread by the sweat of their brows, and only contract debts when necessary, and always with the purpose of honestly paying them, this bill seems to be a dishonest bill: all such bills seem to be dishonest bills. It is a bill to enable a debtor to repudiate the contract which he has honestly made with his creditor for a value which he has received. Some portions of the principles involved in this bill are an every-day occurrence in commercial communities. A man contracts debts; he is unfortunate; he cannot pay them; and his creditors compound with him, and almost always do so when there is no law.

The Senator from Maryland has said that there is no difference in principle between debts contracted under this law and debts contracted before its passage. It seems to me the Senator cannot have well considered that remark. All the debts contracted prior to this law have been contracted without any honest mental reservation that the contract might be repudiated, either by any legal proceedings or any illegal proceedings, by any honest means or by any dishonest means. Therefore, you are passing a law here to enable a debtor to exercise a power against his creditor which he did not have a right to exercise when he contracted his debt, which he does not have the right to exercise to-day. The debtor who contracts a debt after the passage of this act contracts it knowing, if he is an intelligent man, and his creditor knowing, that in a certain contingency or contingencies he may repudiate the debt; he may come into court and surrender his property and tell his creditor to take what little he has got, which is not exempt by either State law or national law, and make the most of it, and obtain a discharge. The man who contracted a debt before such a law was in existence contracted it knowing that no such act existed, knowing that the property possessed by him was liable to be taken under judicial proceedings to satisfy the debt, knowing that there was no civil or other jurisdiction which could wipe out the obligation which he accepted from his creditor. The difference is very great it seems to me.

While I am up, I desire to say one word in relation to the practical operation of this bill in another respect. By the action of the Senate in refusing to make this a uniform bankrupt law—for I think that was the result—and making it vary according to the laws of the different States, you enable a person in one State who may have $5,000 or $7,000, for in California the exemption is $5,000 of gold value amounting at least to $7,000 in currency, to retain that property in his possession visible to all the world, and if he has a debt of $300 he may go into voluntary bankruptcy, live in his nice house, have his horses and his carriage if you please, and I do not know what else; surrender his debt of $300 to his creditor, and surrender nothing else under Heaven, provided he does not have more than $5,000 or $7,000, or it may be $50,000; for I am told in some of the States the exemption is of a kind which would allow $50,000; but when he owes merely $300 he may go into bankruptcy and wipe out that $300, and retain a fortune and be a gentleman, and it may be that that $300 creditor may be a poor man who has not a tithe of the property which he possesses.

Mr. President, it seems to me that when this law goes before the people, when the few debtors who are clamoring for it have got their purpose, you will find one universal cry of repeal among the people. Every man who holds obligations that are wiped out by this law will feel, even if his debtor is worth nothing, that he has been cheated out of so much money; that he has been robbed to that extent; and the law will be as odious as the law of 1841 was odious, and will be as fatal politically to the party and to the men who enact it as that law was.

Mr. President, I do not propose to detain the Senate in further discussing this bill. I only desire to utter my solemn protest against it; and if I were in the habit of predicting I would utter a prediction against it; but as I am not in the habit of predicting I shall save myself that trouble, and save myself from the mortification of being mistaken if I should not prove a true prophet.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think the honorable member is entirely mistaken in applying the term "repudiation" to cases of this description. No man who is unable to pay his debts, because he has no means to pay his debts, can be justly called a repudiator of his obligations. By accidental or unfortunate circumstances he has come to a condition in which it is impossible for him to pay his debts; and it is therefore, in almost every community, provided that in such a contingency, looking to the interest of the creditor as well as to the general interest of the country, he should be freed from the harassing character of his debts, so that he may be enabled to enter into business by which he can support his family and benefit the country. And it is not peculiar to individual creditors. Governments have been obliged to do the same thing. The European Governments, England included, have often been compelled by circumstances to pay to their creditors less than the par amount of their obligations; but nobody suggested that they were justly chargeable with the offense of repudiating their obligations provided the allegations upon which they legislated were true in point of fact.

The honorable member is also, as I think, mistaken in the ground upon which he attempts to draw a distinction between debts now contracted and debts which may be contracted in the future. He supposes that in relation to the latter there is no impropriety in giving to the debtor the benefit of a law of this description, because the creditor at the time the debt is contracted is supposed to be aware that there is such a mode of relief furnished by the existing law to his debtor. The argument is equally forcible, if it be true—and I suppose the honorable member will not deny that—that Congress, under the power to pass a bankrupt law, may pass a law applicable to existing debts. No bankrupt law has ever been passed except because of the large amount of existing debts which were depressing the industry of the country and ruining the debtor. When, therefore, a man, whether in the absence or in the existence of a bankrupt system, contracts a debt, his creditor is supposed to know that there is in the Congress of the United States a power to discharge his debtor upon his delivering up his assets; and if, therefore, it would be proper to apply the principle which the honorable member proposes to apply to debts contracted after this law shall be passed, because the creditor is supposed to know of the existence of the law when he becomes a creditor, it is equally proper to apply it to existing debts because he is supposed to know that under the power to pass uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy Congress may provide that existing debts may be discharged by means of a bankrupt law, as well as prospective debts.

And the honorable member (although it is not involved in the particular amendment) is also mistaken in supposing that a bankrupt law can be applied only to mercantile debts or debts quasi mercantile. In the beginning no one ever doubted the power of Parliament to pass laws bringing within the operation of a bankrupt law all classes of debtors. The Parliament did only bring within the scope of those laws a certain class of debtors; but for years, particularly in modern times, they have gone on from period to period to modify the laws so as to bring within their operation almost all the people of the kingdom who become debtors and innocently unable to pay their debts.

Mr. MORRILL. Traders of a certain description.

Mr. JOHNSON. No; traders of almost every description. They make everybody traders. They go on to define who are traders; but the definition includes everybody. Nobody ever doubted, as I submit to my honorable friend from New Hampshire, that Parliament might pass a law comprehending every class of debtors, whether they called them traders or not, or whether in the general acceptance of the term they were considered as traders; and the power which Congress has is to be considered with reference to the power which Parliament has. The extent of that power does not depend upon the actual exercise of the power by England at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, but depends upon the character of the power, what power had England over bankruptcy, and the moment that we ascertain what that power was, then when by general terms, as general as the language affords, that power was conferred upon Congress, we have it. We are therefore to compare the two powers, and when upon that comparison we find that one was intended to be equally coextensive with the other and find that the other might be used so as to incorporate every kind of indebtedment, it follows that ours was intended to apply to every class of debtors without reference to the character of the class.

Mr. FOGG. A single word more. I cannot feel that the question of power is exactly as the Senator from Maryland supposes, that this Congress has the same power as the Parliament of Great Britain. You know, sir, it is an adage as old as the British constitution itself that Parliament is almighty, is omnipotent. Parliament may do what it will; but we are a Government of limited powers, with a written Constitution. The powers of Congress are limited by that written Constitution. The honorable Senator well knows, although the question has been adjudicated otherwise as I acknowledge, that the best, the wisest, the greatest men this nation has produced have doubted the power of Congress, under a general act establishing a uniform system of bankruptcy, to make that system apply to debts already existing. It has been contended by the ablest of our jurists and the ablest of our statesmen that Congress had no such power; that the exercise of that power would be the exercise of an ex post facto power, and the enactment of such a law would be the enactment of an ex post facto law. I am aware, as I have said, that our courts have adjudicated otherwise, and therefore I do not propose to raise that question; but I do say that the fact that the British Parliament may wipe out every debt in the whole empire of Great Britain does not prove that the American Congress may do that.

But, sir, to return to the question immediately involved in my amendment, what does it propose? It proposes that in relation to all debts contracted prior to the passage of this act no discharge of the debtor shall be granted except upon the written assent of three fourths of his creditors. Is not that a reasonable proposition? Is that a great concession to the moral element in this country that does not believe in repudiating anything? I do not think that I called this repudiation before; but I did say that among the great masses of our honest people, among our farmers all over the land, among our hard-working mechanics, it would be regarded and it would be denounced as a repudiating act. I do say so; I know it, sir. I know that the very word "bankrupt" is an odious word among the masses of our people, of our honest men out of the commercial circles everywhere.

Now, in relation to the hardship of this matter, I have had some experience in my intercourse with men who have been unfortunately in debt and who have been unfortunately reduced to bankruptcy, and my experience has been that while there is here and there among creditors a Shylock, who would take not only the flesh, but the bones and the blood of his debtors, yet Shylocks are not the ordinary rule among creditors—far from it. I do not recollect in all my experience a case where an honest, honorable merchant, or an honest, honorable tradesman, who by misfortune had been reduced into a position where he was unable to pay his debts, has been oppressed by the persistent cruelty of a majority or one half or one quarter of his creditors. Occasionally, as I have said, there is a creditor who is a Shylock, who would take everything the debtor had and perhaps incarcerate him in prison for life; but no man has among his creditors one fourth of the number who are of that character. I repeat I have never known a case where an honest upright debtor, who had been reduced to penury by misfortune and was unable to pay his debts, could not get three fourths of his creditors, especially when he surrendered all he had to them, to grant him a free discharge.

I offer this amendment because I think it will remove a great portion of the odium which I am sure will attach to this bill everywhere when you get out of the commercial communities. Everywhere among the honest yeomanry of the land, you will find that this bill will be regarded as a bill repudiating honest debts, enabling dishonest debtors to shake off their responsibilities, and compelling honest creditors to lose the earnings of their life time.

Mr. POLAND. My friend from New Hampshire very frankly acknowledges that he is hostile to this bill, and that if his amendment prevails he does not expect to vote for it.

Mr. FOGG. No. The honorable Senator mistakes me. I said that I did not expect the amendment would be adopted so that I could vote for the bill. I did not say that if my amendment was adopted I should not vote for the bill.

Mr. POLAND. I perhaps stated the Senator's language a little too strong; but he certainly avows himself very strongly opposed to the principle upon which this bill is founded. Mr. President, my experience here has been short; but I have learned this: that the opponents of a measure are not the safest persons to amend it; they are not its best friends; they are not the ones to be relied on ordinarily to make amendments that are really acceptable and profitable to the measure itself. I do not desire to go into the various topics that have been suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire. I desire merely to say to the Senate that twice already it has voted down by a vote nearly unanimous a proposition substantially like that proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire, only in a less objectionable form. Yesterday the Senate voted down a proposition to make the discharge dependent upon the debtor getting a majority of the creditors. The proposition of the Senator from New Hampshire is to require that he should have three fourths. I can say in reply to this proposition, as I said to the one that came up yesterday, the principle of this bill is that a man who is unable to pay his debts, who has not sufficient property to pay his debts, may go into bankruptcy, surrender all the property he has, have that distributed among his creditors, and get a discharge by law. The principle of this amendment is to remit him to his creditors. If he is obliged to get the consent of his creditors to obtain his discharge, he can get it as well without a bankrupt law as with.

A word in relation to the bankrupt law of 1841. It is said that this bill will share the fate of that law. The bankrupt law of 1841 undoubtedly was very loosely drawn. It did not provide as strictly as it ought to have done against fraud. There were undoubtedly some cases where fraudulent bankrupts went through, got their discharge, while still retaining property. The bill now before the Senate has very much stricter provisions on that subject. It authorizes the creditors within two years after a discharge is obtained, if they find the bankrupt has been guilty of any fraud, any concealment of property, to apply and get the discharge itself set aside and their debts again restored to full life.

I do not design now to go at all into the history of that act of 1841 or the reasons of its unpopularity; but we all understand that the bankrupt law of 1841 came up as one of a series of political measures. It was passed through Congress by the votes of one party against those of the other party. I believe there was in the House but a single instance of a vote in favor of the bankrupt bill except by members of the then dominant party. It was passed with a series of other measures—the national bank bill, the land distribution bill, &c. The party that passed the bankrupt bill very soon met with political reverses, and the bankrupt bill shared the fate of the party and of its associate measures. The cry that was got up against that bankrupt bill was rather a political cry than one that grew out of any fault with the working of the law itself; and I never had any doubt myself that if that law had continued upon the statute-book for another year until it could have been amended, until some of its imperfections could have been provided against by subsequent legislation, it would have stood and have become a permanent bankrupt law, such as all commercial countries have and such as in my judgment this country ought to have.

Mr. FOGG. I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 6, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cragin, Fogg, Lane, Morrill, and Wilcox—6.

NAYS—Messrs. Conness, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Johnson, McDougall, Morgan, Nesmith, Norton, Patterson, Poland, Ramsey, Ross, Saulsbury, Stewart, Sumner, Van Winkle, and Wade—24.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Cattell, Chandler, Cowan, Creswell, Foster, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Guthrie, Hendricks, Kirkwood, Nye, Pomeroy, Riddle, Sherman, Sprague, Trumbull, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—22.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOWARD. I move to amend the bill by striking out in lines twenty-seven, twenty-eight, and twenty-nine of section thirteen, on page 16, the words "manner provided by law for the prosecution of marshals' or other bonds given to the United States," and inserting "name and for the benefit of any injured party;" so as to make the clause read:

The bond shall be approved by the judge or register by his indorsement thereon, shall be filed with the record of the case, and inure to the benefit of all creditors proving their claims, and may be prosecuted in the name and for the benefit of any injured party.

So as to give the injured party, whatever may be his relation, the right to sue upon the official bond given by the assignee, in his own name and for his own benefit. The bond, it will be observed, is to be given by the assignee to the United States, and strictly, according to the rules of law, upon any breach of the conditions of the bond the United States only would have the right to sue. My amendment is to enable any creditor or any injured party, whether the United States or any individual, to bring suit upon that bond in his own name and for his own benefit, so far as he may be interested.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer an amendment, to come in on page 13, after the word "bankrupt," in line thirty-one of section eleven:

Provided, That the judge shall not proceed to the consideration of any such petition until the petitioner has taken and subscribed the oath prescribed by the act of Congress approved 2d July, 1862.

On this I have simply one remark to make. I have heard it said that certain persons at the South were moved to go into rebellion on the idea that in that way they would wipe out their debts to northern creditors. I do not doubt that that was the case with some persons. How extensively rebels acted under that motive I have no means of knowing; but it seems to me that we ought not to provide them the means of wiping out their debts to northern creditors. Therefore, I propose that we shall require of them that they shall take what is usually known as the test oath before their petition is proceeded with. That is the object of my amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. If the honorable member would make it operate equally and provide that no such person should be sued or imprisoned, there might be something like justice in the proposition. I do not think a provision of this sort is to be found anywhere in any of the statutes, so far as I have known, in England or elsewhere. It is true that the parties to whom the amendment applies have committed acts which may be treason or not treason as things actually stand now. They certainly were treason at one time; but whether they are now protected because of the acknowledgment of belligerent rights as between the United States and the confederates is a question upon which I express no opinion. But, however that may be, we look to the time when they are to become citizens of the United States in all respects. They are now citizens. They can go to New York or Boston or anywhere else and contract debts. Massachusetts gentlemen may go down to the South, buy their property, sue them. I do not see any justice in denying them the right to have the benefit of this act, unless it is for the purpose of punishing; and according to that view, if they are to be punished, the honorable member might propose, if he supposes we have the power, that they should be liable to suit, liable to execution, and liable to imprisonment as long as the creditor might think proper.

Requiring a test oath, so far as we have heretofore gone, was only supposed to be necessary in relation to officers of the United States or quasi officers. You would not permit any one who had been engaged in the rebellion to be a member of this branch of Congress or the other, and hence you required the test oath; you would not permit a lawyer to practice in the courts without taking a test oath. To say nothing of the authority of Congress to pass the latter branch of that law, supposing the power to exist, yet each provision was thought by Congress to be necessary in order to keep the offices of the Government in the hands of loyal men; and certainly that reason does not apply to the poor debtors who are crushed to the earth by debt, and are unable to do anything for the support of themselves or for the benefit of their country.

Mr. SUMNER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. DIXON. I ask for the reading of the oath referred to on the amendment.

The Secretary read the oath prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862, as follows:

I, A. B., do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I have never voluntarily borne arms against the United States since I have been a citizen thereof; that I have voluntarily given no aid, counsel, countenance, or encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility thereto; that I have neither sought nor accepted, nor attempted to exercise the functions of any office whatever, under any authority or pretended authority in hostility to the United States; that I have not yielded a voluntary support to any pretended government, authority, power, or constitution within the United States, hostile or inimical thereto. And I do further swear (or affirm) that, to the best of my knowledge and ability, I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter: So help me God.

Mr. CONNESS. As I understand the object and purpose of this bill, it is to furnish a mode of relieving citizens who are hopelessly involved from the condition of the thrall which circumstances have placed upon them, and to enable them to enter again into the world of business, and not only for the purpose of giving relief to the persons as individuals, but for the additional purpose of giving the benefit of their industry and their efforts and their energies to society. If that be the purpose of the act, it is equally as important to relieve a man who was a rebel, a man who is ready now to labor and to work, as it is to relieve a loyal man. I am willing to apply what is called the test of loyalty where it may be properly done; but I would as soon think of introducing it, I will not now say where, as to introduce it in connection with this bill. I think that test oaths, perhaps, have their degree of usefulness, and will for a time to come, but I do not think that this is the sphere of their usefulness, and therefore I cannot vote for the amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. I submit that this is the "sphere of their usefulness;" at least for the present. The time will come I trust, and very soon, when there will be no occasion for test oaths. I shall welcome that time as cordially as the Senator from California or any other Senator on this floor. Suffice it to say that hour has not yet sounded. There is not a mail which does not bring us reports of the grossest insubordination in this rebel region, of injustice to neighbors, of cruelty to freedmen. The rebellion is not yet completely suppressed. When that time is reached, then let us open this Chamber and open all our courts, as we shall freely open all our hearts; but that time has not yet come. Until then we owe it to ourselves and we owe it to the country to fix all possible safeguards; and now as you are about to pass this important measure, which is going to readjust the relations of debtor and creditor throughout the country, I submit that you must teach hard-hearted men that they cannot come forward and claim the benefits of this act unless they can show that they are loyal citizens, and we have no other way of bringing them to that test except by requiring the oath which Congress has already prescribed in many other cases.

Mr. POLAND. The subject of the rebellion and the rebels is connected with almost everything that we have here in the Senate; but I thought we had at last got upon a bill that would steer clear entirely of that. I have as poor an opinion of the rebellion as my friend, the Senator from Massachusetts; I believe I would do anything that was proper to be done in the way of punishing those who went into it as cheerfully and as firmly and strongly as he would; but it seems to me this proposition of the Senator is going a very great way. It is substantially saying that every man who had anything to do with the rebellion shall have no benefit of this law if it passes. Why, Mr. President, we might with just the same propriety pass a law that no man should be a suitor in court; we might with the same propriety pass a statute that no man should prosecute any claim in any court of the United States unless he could take this test oath as to put it on to this bill. We might with the same propriety say that a poor debtor should not be allowed to take the poor debtors' oath unless he could, in the first place, take the test oath. We might as well require it in the one case as the other.

This test oath has, so far as the law applies it now, been confined to specific cases. We require that a man shall be able to take that oath and take it truly before he occupies any official place, before he practices as an attorney, before he occupies any official governmental relation. All that I am in favor of; but when we come to apply it to the ordinary transactions of life, and to say that a man shall not do business, a man shall not work out by the month unless he is able to take the test oath, I cannot agree to it. We might just as well apply it to every branch of business, to every vocation in life, it seems to me, as to apply it to this bill.

We all understand the condition of the country South. Some were in fault and some were not. That whole country is broken down and impoverished. If there is any need of a bankrupt bill anywhere there is need of it there; and are we going to exclude that whole southern country and all its people from the benefits of this law because they may have engaged in a causeless rebellion or been led into it by ambitious, unscrupulous leaders? It seems to me this is carrying the thing altogether too far.

Mr. POMEROY. If the Senator from Massachusetts would modify his amendment so as to require the test oath so far as it may be applicable to a debtor of this kind I would not object to it, and I think that modification will secure some votes for his amendment; it will certainly secure mine. The oath as it now stands is made to apply to persons who are about to enter on the discharge of the duties of some office.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator will excuse me for asking him to suggest, before he takes his seat, how he thinks the oath can possibly be made applicable to this case.

Mr. POMEROY. I have not got that far yet. I was about to say to the Senator from Massachusetts that I think it would strengthen this bill if it was somewhat restrictive in its operation. I said yesterday that now for the first time in the history of the country a period had come when perhaps a bankrupt bill could be sustained. I never heretofore have supposed that one of this character could be made popular and sustained in the States; but it will strengthen it amazingly if leading and notorious rebels can be excluded from the operations of the act, at least until restoration or reconstruction has been made complete. I would not have it apply in such a way that they should be forever, eternally excluded; but until some system of restoration has been agreed upon, until the status of the people of the rebel States has been established in this country and under this Government, so that we may know what their relations to the Government are, I am not for letting them in to take the benefit of this bankrupt law. I would not say that they may not come in next year or within three months; but just at this particular time, before we have any method adopted that promises peace and union to these States, I am not prepared to send this law down there for execution and application to such men. I am willing to apply it to loyal men, those even whose honest purpose is to become loyal and good citizens in the future. Unfortunately, however, there are many men in the South, and they are the rich and the wealthy men of the South, who will make no promises for the future even of loyalty and devotion to this Government. I do not propose to let those men up if they are bankrupts. I have got no motive for doing it if other Senators have. And yet I would not exclude all the South by any means. In our constitutional amendment we only struck at leading rebels, those who had added perjury to treason, and said they should not hold office. We did not apply it to everybody.

Mr. SUMNER. I accept very cheerfully the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas. I supposed that in administering the oath the change would naturally be made. But I will modify my amendment by adding these words at the end of it: "omitting such words thereto as refer to the duties of any office," and then only that part of the oath which is peculiarly in the nature of a test will be administered.

Mr. POMEROY. I shall vote for the amendment with that modification, and will only add to what I have already said this remark: that I hope the time may soon come when the status and condition of these States will be so established, and their relations to this Government will be so cordial, that we may extend to all their citizens the same laws and the same provisions of law in all respects that we extend to all other citizens.

Mr. STEWART. There has been a great deal said about making this a uniform law. It was strenuously contested here for two days last week that if we allowed the State exemption laws to prevail the bill would be wanting in uniformity. Now, it seems to me that if we exclude from the operation of the law one third or one fourth of the inhabitants of the United States it will certainly be wanting in uniformity. I believe that would destroy the law altogether. This amendment is equivalent to saying that it is impolitic to pass any law on the subject of bankruptcy, because there is no court which will say that you can pass a bankrupt law and at the same time exclude from its operation a large class of the people of the United States. There is no court which will sustain that as a uniform law.

As I understand this law, it is for the benefit of the loyal as well as disloyal, to enable the business of the country to readjust itself and prosper after the great troubles through which we have passed. It is to the interest of all parties that this law should be passed, the interest of the creditor that he may have the debtor's property distributed fairly in the United States courts, the interest of the honest but unfortunate debtor that he may again engage in business and be enabled to elevate his energies in such a way as to be useful to the community. And if you say that it shall not operate as to a large portion of the people the law is unconstitutional. We cannot pass that kind of a law. That is too manifest a want of uniformity.

But perhaps it may be said that this is done by way of punishment. Then it comes under the prohibition to pass an ex post facto law, and it will destroy the efficacy of the bill. You cannot accomplish the object in this way. There are other ways of punishment. In making a uniform law you have no right for any reason to except any large class. As the Senator from Kansas suggested, you may perhaps put an oath as to present belief, which every body can take, and it will be uniform. You can make them swear that they do not believe in secession, if you choose, but even that would be out of place in a law of this kind. The question presented is simply this: will you have a bankrupt law at all? With such a provision as this in it I am satisfied the law will be unconstitutional and void.

Mr. HOWARD. The honorable Senator from Nevada objects to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, that it is unconstitutional. What is the amendment? In legal effect it is this: that it excepts and excludes from the operation of the bankrupt bill before us that large class of persons who have participated in waging war against the United States. They are not to receive the benefit of the act according to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts. But does this exclusion render the bill unconstitutional? Will the Senator from Nevada say that the bill would be unconstitutional if it were confined exclusively to merchants and traders? I think he would not. I think he would concede at once the power of Congress to pass a bankrupt act to apply only to traders and merchants.

Mr. STEWART. Right there let me ask a question. Suppose it included some merchants and excluded others, would not that be unconstitutional for want of uniformity?

Mr. HOWARD. The operation of the bill must necessarily include such classes only as Congress sees fit to apply it to, and undoubtedly it is for Congress to judge whether it is best to apply the benefit of the act to any one particular class or whether it is best to exclude that class. The act itself will be uniform upon the persons and the subject-matter embraced within its purview; and all else are excluded. I cannot regard that objection as well taken, I confess.

Well, sir, as to the propriety and expediency of excluding the classes embraced in the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, I am in favor of it. We are about to pass an act of Congress which is to operate as an act of forbearance, indulgence, and mercy to a large class of persons, persons who without any fault on their own part have become insolvent and unable to pay their debts. Congress is now coming forward and in the shape of an act is about to say to them, "If you make a surrender of all your property liable to be taken upon execution you shall be discharged from the obligation of your contracts." This is an act of indulgence and mercy and kindness and humanity on the part of the Government. The question is whether that class of persons at the South, who have willfully been engaged in making war upon the Government of the United States for the purpose of overthrowing it, are now in justice or morality entitled to this great act of jubilee on our part?

Sir, an immense proportion of this class at the South have been rendered bankrupt and reduced to poverty by their own criminal conduct. Immense estates at the South, valued at millions of dollars, have been squandered and destroyed by this rebellion, have been engulfed in the immense whirlpool that has carried away, not only the property, but the persons of so many of the citizens of the rebellious States. They went into this criminal conduct willfully, knowingly; they appropriated their property for the purpose of waging this war; they voluntarily deprived themselves of their property, rendered themselves bankrupt and unable to pay their debts, either domestic or those which they owe abroad by means of their own unjustifiable and treasonable conduct and principles.

Now, sir, can that class of persons, after having done all in their power with fire and sword as well as their money to destroy this Government and overthrow it, come forward consistently and claim at our hands this great act of mercy and indulgence? I am unwilling to grant them this. Let them meet the fate they have courted. They threatened themselves at the beginning of the war that they would fight until they were driven to the last ditch, until not a man, woman, or child should be left on the soil of the South to tell the tale of their ultimate destruction if they should be destroyed. We have driven them into the last ditch by force of arms. I am unwilling now to turn around and say to these people, "I will discharge you from your honest debts because you are insolvent," while at the same time I know that this insolvency has been created by their own efforts to destroy my Government and my country. Sir, let them meet the decrees of retributive justice without flinching, and not ask us for mercy in such a shape as this.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, like my friend from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] I was a little surprised to find that the rebellion was to be brought in this debate. In answer to the concluding remarks of the honorable member from Michigan, I do not know that the citizens of the South are the parties who are asking for the passage of this act. I rather think the application comes from citizens of States that are called loyal. Certainly no representative of the southern States that were in the rebellion is here or in the other House. The whole legislation, therefore, upon the subject has been the result of the judgment of the representatives of the loyal States and for the benefit of their people. What made the citizens of Michigan, such of them as are unfortunately in that condition, bankrupts in fact? I suppose it was misfortune of one kind or other. In the South many became bankrupt perhaps because of the war, and perhaps because of other circumstances. But I should like to know of the honorable member from Massachusetts, and of the honorable member from Michigan, if they propose to except from the operation of this law all southern debtors. Do they mean to deny the creditors in the loyal States the right to proceed compulsorily against their debtors in the disloyal States under this law?

Mr. HOWARD. I do not know that the amendment of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts covers that case.

Mr. JOHNSON. I know it does not. Then it is proposed to leave the compulsory branch of the law in force. What will be the effect of that? Whether a rebel debtor, so to term him, is to be discharged or not is to depend upon a loyal creditor. If a loyal creditor proceeds against him it is not proposed to qualify the discharge which the debtor is to obtain under the compulsory process so as to limit it only to those who may be able to take the oath proposed by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts to be prescribed. Then the result of this bill is that the debtor's discharge is to depend upon the fact of whether the loyal creditor applies himself for the benefit of the law. He will have to apply. If he does not apply for the benefit of the law as against his debtor in all human probability he will never get a dollar of his debt. Leave the estate in the hands of the bankrupt debtor and he may dispose of it just as he thinks proper. Whatever he has left he may live upon until he exhausts every dollar of his property; he may sell it, convert it into money, leave the State and leave the country, and then what is to become of the loyal creditor? The bill is intended and will operate as much if not more for the loyal creditor than it will for the disloyal debtor.

Now, Mr. President, I should just as soon have thought of applying such a provision as this to this bill as of proposing an amendment, which at one time I thought perhaps my friend from Massachusetts would propose, that the law was to apply to all citizens of the United States without distinction of color, [laughter,] so as to revive the question whether there are such distinctions or should be such distinctions. We want a bankrupt law for the benefit of all, not for the benefit of the South, but we want it to operate upon citizens of the South who are debtors, not only for their benefit, but for the benefit of their creditors who are found in the loyal States, and, among other States, in the State of Michigan. Does the honorable member propose to deny to the creditor who lives in Michigan the right to proceed as against his disloyal debtor in the State of Louisiana? I understand him to say so.

Mr. SUMNER. Certainly not. It is not applicable to that case.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understand it perfectly, and I have asserted it so. It is not proposed. Well, will he not apply, and if he does apply, is it suggested that the effect of the discharge is not to be as absolute of such a debtor as it will be of a debtor in the loyal States? And if it is to be, why is it to be? Only upon the ground that he who surrenders either by compulsion or voluntarily all his estate ought to be discharged from his debts.

Mr. SUMNER. I will merely make one remark in reply to the learned Senator from Maryland. He says that he understood the proposition. I doubt not that he did, but I am inclined to think, nevertheless, that the Senate may perhaps have been—he will pardon me the expression—a little befogged by the remark of the Senator. I wish, therefore, that the Senate should distinctly understand that my amendment is simply applicable to a voluntary petitioner for the benefit of this act who himself has been a debtor. It is not applicable to any adversary proceedings against him.

Mr. JOHNSON. I said so.

Mr. SUMNER. I know the Senator said so. It is not applicable to any adversary proceedings against a bankrupt: it is only applicable to the case of the bankrupt himself seeking the benefits of this act; and the question is then presented whether at this moment, this day, in the present condition of things in that whole rebel region, you are prepared to allow disloyal persons, in other words persons who cannot take the test oath, to come forward and share the benefit of this great act of mercantile and commercial amnesty; for that is the character of the bankrupt act? The day for amnesty, whether it be mercantile or political, has not yet come. There is no one who is more anxious for that day than I am, or who will welcome it more sincerely; but it has not yet come; and it cannot come until all the foundations of security are fixed throughout that whole region; it cannot come until the existing governments in that region are entirely brushed aside as having no legal or constitutional existence. They are the creatures of a usurpation; that is all. They ought not to exist; and until they are brushed aside and until you have security in that region there is no opportunity for amnesty.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, I took some part in passing the bankrupt act of 1841. That contained, as this does, what is called the voluntary clause, and I have always been in favor of it. I have been in favor of it for several reasons. I believe that we ought to have a bankrupt act in the country; and my observation has convinced me that it is impossible to pass any bankrupt act at all except under the pressure of opinion and feeling created by the existence of a good deal of bankruptcy in the country and the desire of individuals to be relieved. I have no question about the constitutional authority, the perfect power of Congress to pass it in that form if it sees fit.

The reasons, in addition to what I have already stated, why I have been in favor of it are two: first, because I am willing to relieve individuals, of whom there are a great number who cannot be relieved in any other way, for their own benefit; and second, because I believe it would be very beneficial to the country to restore to the power of labor and usefulness, and to relieve from the oppressiveness of a burden of debt which they cannot meet, a large number of individuals who would become active and useful citizens, and thus advance the interests of the country.

These reasons have always operated on me as sufficient to induce me to run the risk of the odium (if odium may be occasioned by it) or the unpopularity that may arise from the passage of such a law. I believe it will be beneficial and useful; and when the country has once been relieved in that way by the voluntary clause, it will be but a very short time before it will cease to operate, because then all come under what is called the compulsory clause, as a general rule. That is to say, existing debts being swept away, others will be incurred under the act itself; and they will be debts made with a perfect understanding in the community as to what they will be subject to, what the law of the land is, and every body who gives credit will give it with a perfect understanding of what the result may be.

That being the case, I am utterly opposed to the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts. I have felt pained that I was obliged, by my sense of duty and by the conduct of men in the southern States which were in rebellion, to resort to the stringent measures to which we have been obliged to resort in order to prevent evil to the public. These test oaths and other measures of that description are in themselves of an objectionable character always, and only to be excused by the necessity of the case. So far as they are applicable to political power, to holding office, so as to prevent certain men from seeking or being able to get the control of public affairs, I think they are entirely justifiable at present; but outside of that I am desirous, and I presume every Senator here is desirous, that at the earliest possible day all these States of which we speak may become again prosperous, that they may be relieved from their present condition of pecuniary and other suffering, and may again be prosperous in every sense of the word. I think we all desire that. It is for the benefit of the whole country that it should be so, not quite so directly for our benefit as for theirs; but indirectly whatever tends to promote their prosperity and their good tends to the prosperity and the good of the whole country.

Now, sir, in legislating upon business affairs, matters merely of every day occurrence, having no connection with the political power of the country, no connection with any question which would tend to create difficulty hereafter, but simply affecting their pecuniary interests, their prosperity as individuals constituting communities, I am shocked at the idea of making a distinction between them and us. Why do it in any law which has reference simply to matters of business, affecting only individual prosperity and comfort? I would relieve them gladly if I could do so with a proper regard to the safety of the country from all these test oaths. I cannot do it according to my own judgment of what is necessary, and therefore I leave that to time and the changes that time brings with it. But, sir, in everything else, with reference to any measure that may tend to promote the prosperity of that region, I feel an interest in it which would induce me certainly on no occasion to make a distinction between them and us with regard to those ordinary matters. I was in favor at the last session of appropriating a large sum of money to repair the levees on the Mississippi river; and the Senate I think passed the proposition, but the other House rejected it. I am in favor of other measures which will tend to encourage the growth of the interests of that section of the country just as much as I am of measures which will tend to encourage the growth of our own interests and of our own prosperity, because they are now a part of the body-politic, and sooner or later they must resume their position as States.

Hence a proposition of this character coming from my friend from Massachusetts a little surprises me. I am astonished that he does not see that it is for our good as well as for the good of these communities that there should be no distinction in all the ordinary affairs of life, in the application of beneficial laws, between them and ourselves. Sir, if an amendment of this sort was incorporated into the bill, desirous as I am to pass it I would not vote for the bill. I would not vote for anything which to my mind is of so odious a character.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, whatever may be said about other laws affecting commercial transactions, I believe the bankrupt system of every civilized nation on the globe embraces within its provisions even alien enemies; and the proposition to exclude from the benefits of this bill those persons who have been once engaged in rebellion, but have given up the cause of the rebellion and profess at least their determination to be obedient to the Constitution and laws of the United States, is the last proposition I ever expected to hear presented or entertained in this body.

Mr. President, aside from that question, the truth is that what the South perhaps needs more than anything else at the present time is the breaking up of the large landed estates into smaller farms, to be occupied and cultivated by the system of free labor. And this bill, in my judgment, both in its compulsory clauses and in its voluntary clauses, will tend to do that very thing. When proceedings are taken against a debtor who may reside at the South, whose property mainly consists in vast bodies of real estate, the result of the decree of the court will be that the lands are to be sold, and they will be sold and titles will be given, titles upon which men can rest, and in that way the estates will be divided.

If you hold out to persons having this kind of property, when it is incumbered and they are involved, the right to come into the court of bankruptcy and ask for a sale and distribution of the property, it will operate in the same way; and, in my judgment, by leaving it in its full operation, both in its compulsory provisions and in its voluntary provisions, the measure is one of the best measures that can be conceived for the purpose of breaking up the great landed estates of the South and dividing them into small farms, which is essential to the adoption of that kind of civilization which rests upon free labor. The other system, resting upon slave labor, continually increased the landed estates; but the free labor system has a tendency to break them up into small farms, and by breaking them into small farms have more thickly-settled neighborhoods, and with those neighborhoods come villages and school-houses and all that which distinguishes the northern civilization of the free States.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I sympathize with the Senator from Wisconsin in his aspirations: I hope that these great estates will be broken up. Possibly in the bankrupt bill there may be something which will have a tendency in that direction: how much I know not. However, I accept the Senator's argument in favor of a bankrupt bill. I am sincerely in favor of such a measure. All Senators about me know that from the first moment this bill has been brought forward I have avowed myself without hesitation in its favor. I am, therefore, one of its friends. Being one of its friends I desire its improvement. I wish it to be put on a foundation of justice that can stand. I submit that while it proposes to open the doors of the court-house to persons yet reeking with rebellion, it is not founded in justice, nor is it founded in humanity, and there I come directly in conflict with the able Senator from Maine. His argument to my mind was not an argument for humanity or for justice, but just the reverse. It is because I wish to organize justice and to organize humanity in that whole rebel region that I have brought forward the proposition on which you are to vote.

I do not imagine that such an amendment if adopted would be in any permanent act of bankruptcy. I should hope anxiously that the time would come soon when it might be dropped; but that is not the question. We are to deal with the hour as it is, not to deal with the hour as it may be to-morrow or next year. We are to deal with the existing exigency. Now, the Senator from Maine, as I understood him, recognized the value of test oaths on certain matters. He does intend perhaps to remove them. Why? Because we are still in that transition period, passing from the bloody agonies of a rebellion to a peace that unhappily is not yet assured. Give us that true and glorious peace, and then gladly will we tear to pieces all these statutes requiring test oaths; but until that day comes, so blessed and so much longed for, we cannot give up the oaths. The Senator from Maine does not propose to give up the oaths.

And that brings me to the precise question whether the oath should not be applied to this case. Look at that region: is it not now in a state of insubordination? Is it not full of cruelty and bloodshed? Is there one of those States where there are not hundreds of those persons to whom you are bound by every tie of honor and justice daily sacrificed? And by whom are they sacrificed? By the late rebels, who cannot take your test oath. Is there any such thing as security in those States now? Is there security of person, security of opinion, security of property? Nothing of the kind. But then civilization exists only through security. If I were to embody in one word what I most desire now for that unhappy part of my country it would be security. Security, of course, for human rights, security for property, security for business, security for travel. We all know that no such security now exists there.

Mr. POLAND. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts how those things are to be bettered by preventing people going into bankruptcy?

Mr. SUMNER. I am coming to that. Security, I say, is what we require there. Security from whom? From rebels, from persons who cannot take a test oath. Those people must be made to feel that they are no longer masters. The rebel spirit must be broken down. Now, I know no better way to break it down for the present, during this transition period, than by excluding them from these Chambers, by excluding them from office, by excluding them from the benefits of a great act of legislation like that which you are about to adopt. This is my reply to the Senator from Vermont. Let us do all we can to break down the rebel spirit, and let us tell Unionists, without distinction of color, (if I may be pardoned the expression by my friend from Maryland,) let us teach them all that, so far as we can, we mean to protect them and save them harmless from their oppressors.

I say, then, let us break down the rebel spirit. Do not give them any additional strength. Unhappily they are now too strong. There is an old maxim of law which both of my learned friends [Mr. POLAND and Mr. FESSENDEN] will remember well, to this effect: that whoso would have equity must do equity. Let these rebels do equity, and how gladly shall we do every equity to them. Then they will not ask to come into these Halls or to come into the court-house or to come into the privilege of the bankrupt act; every thing will be open to them; but while they continue to do wrong to those to whom we owe protection I cannot consent to relax any of that austerity or rigor, if you choose to call it so, which is important in the support of human rights. I believe that human rights are of some value, and I do not think that men who trifle with them are to be lightly taken by the hand or to be accepted into our fraternity.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, the Senator surprises me more and more. Through all that country every one knows that there are many who entered into this rebellion unwillingly and because they were compelled to do so by the pressure of power upon them. How many of this class there are we do not know, but unquestionably many thousands. We know very well that they have all been made bankrupt substantially; their property has been destroyed; they are poor; they cannot pay their debts. Now, the Senator in order to be severe would strike at every man without distinction who cannot take the test oath, no matter under what circumstances he was compelled to act as he did, no matter what pressure was brought to bear upon him to force him into ranks that he hated; in order to practice vengeance upon the whole mass of the community the Senator would punish the whole, the comparatively innocent as well as the guilty. And how? Not simply by excluding them from office, not simply by excluding them from political power, not simply by providing all the safeguards that are necessary to prevent their doing evil in the Republic, but by denying them bread and water, because the argument goes to that extent: starve them, scourge them. Ay, it goes to that extent, or it goes for nothing. The same argument that applies to the Senator's extent would go the whole extent. Sir, I accede to no such bloody doctrine as this. "Security!" What kind of security do you get by making men desperate, more desperate than they are now? These men are poor; they plunder perhaps; they oppress. They are suffering under all the irritation produced by their condition. Is it not a sensible thing to relieve them, make them feel that they have a stake in the community, that there is a chance for them to lift themselves out of the slough of despond into which they have fallen, to elevate themselves into men of property, to become intelligent, useful citizens, instead of saying, "You shall have no benefit from any beneficial and kind law; stay where you are, bankrupt, broken, desperate, driven to all extremities, and made to feel that the more you oppress your fellow-man the more you are justified by the condition in which we insist upon keeping you?"

Is that the kind of security the gentleman expects to gain from legislation of this description? Sir, I hold to no such security as that. If I lived in a community of desperate men my policy would be to render them less desperate; my policy would be to encourage them to do something for themselves, to lift themselves above the condition into which they were fallen, to turn their attention to the arts of peace, and not drive them to robbery and plunder, which follow a feeling of desperate circumstances.

Sir, the Senator is mistaken. He has spoken to-day not from the impulses of his heart, which I know to be good—and in nothing that I say would I intimate that he is not just as kind as I know he is—but from a mistaken view as to the extent to which this thing ought to be carried. I adjure the Senate to carry their legislation not into matters which regard private life, and regard simply the ordinary business of the world. I go as far as anybody in depriving these people of power in the Republic until I am satisfied that that power can be exercised with safety to the Republic; and when that moment arrives I would withdraw my hand even from them; but under no circumstances would I, with regard to the ordinary affairs of life, make a distinction between them and ourselves. While they remain a part of this great Republic they shall have the benefit of all the laws that we pass of this description or of any other description, so far as they can have it without danger to ourselves or to the whole.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator in his last position. He says he would make no distinction with them in the ordinary concerns of life. Agreed: I am with him. I make no distinction in the ordinary concerns of life; I insist that your legislation shall bear equally upon them and upon others; but the question is whether the measure you are about to pass comes in the category of the ordinary concerns of life. It is, on the contrary, I submit, extraordinary. It is a new act of legislation providing a great, a peculiar remedy, one that this country has not known for a whole generation. The Senator alluded to the early bill. I remember it well. It was in 1841. All that intervening time has passed and you have had no bankrupt act. Now at last you are about to have one, and the question is to whom this extraordinary act of legislation shall be applicable.

I take the Senator from Maine at his word.

I will not make any difference between them and us in the ordinary concerns of life; but when the question is on what is extraordinary, on what does not belong to the ordinary concerns of life, there my friend from Maine must pardon me if I cannot see our duty as he sees it. To my mind the course that the Senator proposes will help, so far as it has any influence, to invigorate that spirit of the rebellion which I know he hates as well as I. I know he would not intentionally do anything to invigorate it; but I fear that his words to-day may add somewhat to those multitudinous influences which are spreading over that region calculated to awaken those old feelings which ought to be trampled out forever.

I said when I was up before that what I sought as the one thing needful to my country at this moment was security. I do not see well how you can vote on any measure now without bringing it to that great test: does it help to establish the foundations of security in that part of our country which has been so unhappily deranged? I ask myself that question every day. I cannot avoid it; it presses upon me in all that we do; and when any measure is proposed which seems to my mind, so far as it has any influence to impair somewhat the bases of security, to invigorate, it may be, anew the rebel spirit, to quicken the spirit of outrage which exists so extensively there, I hope I shall be pardoned if I array myself against it. I cannot do otherwise. I am seeking for my country repose, tranquillity, all that is comprehended in that blessed word—peace. There is nothing that I will not do to accomplish that result. It is because I most earnestly seek that result that I have brought forward the proposition on which you are to vote.

The Senator from Maine in his last remarks was careful again to express his adhesion to the test oaths as they exist; he does not seek to do them away, but he wishes no extension of them. Now, I desire no extension of them; but then I surrender myself freely to the principle of the case. If sound principle requires that the test oath shall be extended to other cases I go where principle leads.

The Senator reminded us that if this provision was adopted it would bear hard upon certain persons who were pressed into the rebellion and who were really loyal in heart. Let me ask my friend if that same argument is not equally strong against every test oath on our statute-books? Is not the oath hard on all that class of persons to whom the Senator has referred?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, and therefore I would not extend it.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator says it is hard and therefore he would not extend it. To that let me reply, that the principle which governs in the one case should govern in the other before us. If the oath is proper in the other cases it is proper in this. But the Senator says he would not extend this principle. Let me say that the true Unionists at the South, so far as I have conversed with them, have always been anxious that you should not in any way impair the efficacy of the existing test oaths. They saw in them how much of safety and protection there was for Unionists.

I will not proceed any further. I hope the Senate will adopt the amendment.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator from Massachusetts will see by referring to the nineteenth section of the bill that after proceedings in voluntary bankruptcy have been commenced the creditors must file their claims before the register or before the court. I desire to ask him before voting on this proposition whether, if his amendment be adopted, he intends to apply it also to the creditors, so that no creditor shall have his claim allowed until he takes the test oath.

Mr. SUMNER. I had not so intended. I had intended to meet simply the case of a voluntary bankruptcy and to require the oath of the petitioner himself. There I stop.

Mr. HENDERSON. If that be the case I cannot vote for the proposition. However proper it might be as applied in the case of a debtor, it surely must be applied to the creditor in order to make it anything like equal. I think it would be but proper to make the creditor in a case of involuntary bankruptcy, to which the Senator says he does not intend his amendment to apply, take the oath. Otherwise you enable rebel creditors to push to bankruptcy a fellow rebel and even a loyal debtor without taking the oath. The Senator, I understand, does not propose to require the rebel creditor to take the oath even when he pushes to bankruptcy a loyal man.

Mr. SUMNER. Allow me to make a suggestion to my friend. I have moved this proposition with reference to voluntary bankruptcy. The Senator of course can move his proposition when mine has been acted upon. The proposition which he makes now would not come in the place where mine is moved; it would come in another part of the bill. Let the Senator move his proposition, and I shall be ready to act upon it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I merely desired, not to offer the proposition, but to know to what extent the Senator wished to carry his amendment. It seems to me that in cases of voluntary bankruptcy, if it is applicable to the debtor, it ought to be to the creditor, and that no creditor should be permitted to prove his claim unless he takes the test oath. The Senate will see at once that if the two propositions together be carried in the southern States, so far as debts are confined to the southern States, it would be utterly impossible to get a case of voluntary bankruptcy under the act. I misunderstood the Senator in reply to a question propounded by the Senator from Maryland as to his desire to make the requirement apply to a case of involuntary bankruptcy. I understood him to say that he did not propose to make it obligatory upon the debtor in a case of involuntary bankruptcy before he obtained a discharge to take the test oath. In that view, both in regard to voluntary and involuntary bankruptcy, the adoption of this proposition would work very harshly indeed. I cannot therefore consent to vote for it.

Mr. HOWE. I want to say just this upon the pending proposition: if I regarded this act as the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Michigan seem to regard it, as a private act for the relief of individual debtors from the obligation of their debts, then I should agree with the Senator from Massachusetts that rebels ought to be excluded from the benefits of the act; and I should think that thieves and murderers and all other criminals ought to be excluded from the act, and I should think that the debtors themselves ought to be excluded from the act, and I should be opposed to the act. But I do not understand that to be the nature or the purpose of the bill. I understand it to be, not a private law but a public law, not a law administering the public charities of the nation or the clemency of the nation to anybody in the world, but a law declaring that upon grounds of public policy, not upon grounds of public charity, it is better that the estates of certain debtors insolvent should be taken possession of by the courts, should be administered for the benefit of all their creditors, and then that the indebtedness of the individual should be at an end. If it be a matter of public policy that that should be done with reference to one debtor, it is a requirement of public policy that it should be done with reference to every other debtor, whether he be guilty or innocent, whether he has committed one crime or another or no crime at all.

And as I understand that to be the purpose of the bill I shall vote against this amendment, with no view of encouraging rebels to cease to be rebels. I agree with the Senator from Maine that there are undoubtedly a great many down in these southern districts who did not enter into the great rebellion voluntarily. But there are none down there who cannot come out of the guilt of the rebellion voluntarily;

there is nobody compelling them to stay in rebellion, and therefore I am not for encouraging them to come out any further than we have. We have dealt very generously and magnanimously with them I think heretofore. I do not think we have anything to do with the question of crime in the enactment of this law. It is a matter which the people of the United States demand, which the public demand, for the public good and not for individuals.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 10, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Cragin, Fogg, Fowler, Howard, Lane, Pomeroy, Sumner, Wade, and Wilson—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Foster, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Kirkwood, Morgan, Morrill, Norton, Patterson, Poland, Ramsey, Ross, Sanbury, Sherman, Stewart, Van Winkle, Wiley, Williams, and Yates—30.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Caltell, Creswell, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Guthrie, McDougall, Nesmith, Nye, Riddle, Sprague, and Trumbull—12.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend section ten, which is the section authorizing the Chief Justice and two associates to frame rules. The Supreme Court will be in session in the spring, have an adjourned term, and I move to amend the section by striking out the word "chief" in the first line, then changing the word "justice," in the second line, to "justices," and after the words "United States," in the same line, striking out the words "with the assistance of any two of the associate justices of the Supreme Court, to be selected by said justice;" so that the section will read:

That the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, and subject to the provisions of this act, shall frame general orders for the following purposes, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I hope we shall now be allowed to get a vote on the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to insert the following proviso in the same section in which the proviso offered by the Senator from Massachusetts was proposed to be inserted; it is to come in after the word "bankrupt" on page 13, section eleven, line thirty-one:

Provided, That all citizens of the United States petitioning to be declared bankrupt, shall, on filing such petition and before any proceedings thereon, take and subscribe an oath of allegiance and fidelity to the United States; which oath shall be filed and recorded with the proceedings in bankruptcy.

The object of this amendment is to apply to these persons who have been rebels and who still ought to be entitled to petition in bankruptcy if they are willing to return to their allegiance. The Government has so far always required when any of those persons have been admitted to rights of citizenship again a fresh oath of allegiance, because the fact is well known that in most cases they have taken an oath of hostility, that is an oath in favor of the confederacy. The simple effect of this amendment is to require every citizen who is to take the benefit of the act to readhere, if he has been a rebel, to the United States. I am sure there can be no objection to that.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am not sure that I understand the amendment. Is it made to apply to all persons who may seek the benefit of the act, or only to citizens—

Mr. EDMUNDS. All citizens of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON. Let it be read again.

The Secretary read the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. On page 12, section eleven, line four, I move to strike out "three hundred" and to insert "one thousand;" so as to read:

That if any person residing within the jurisdiction of the United States, owing debts provable under this act exceeding the amount of $1,000, shall apply by petition, &c.

Mr. POLAND. It seems to me this amendment ought not to be adopted. There is a very large class of debtors who owe less than $1,000 who have no means of paying, whose condition requires the aid of a bankrupt law as much as those who owe larger amounts. It would operate as a very great hardship upon a very large class of persons, who are intended to be benefited and relieved by the provisions of this act, to have it limited to those whose debts were more than $1,000.

Mr. HENDERSON. I offered the amendment in good faith, supposing that the bill is to become a law. I apprehend from the votes we have had in the Senate that it is a foregone conclusion that the bill is to be adopted. If it is to be, I think it would remove many objections that will be presented in its operation to confine it at least to amounts of $1,000 and over. I am clearly satisfied that $300 will not more than pay the expenses attending a bankrupt certificate, and it only opens the door, as I stated yesterday, for individuals to petition the courts for the relief granted under the bill, and to obtain that relief by making distribution of their property to the officers of the court. It will amount to that; and much objection will be made to the bill in consequence of that fact.

There was a limitation under the law of 1800, I believe, to $500, and a limitation under the law of 1841. If I remember aright, no person could be driven to bankruptcy under the act of 1841 unless he was a trader and unless he owed $2,000. Under this bill, as I understand it, an individual can be driven to bankruptcy for a debt of $250. Some of his creditors, small creditors, may drive him into bankruptcy and cause his assets to be entirely eaten up in the costs of the proceeding. He may give his assets over to the officers of the court, and after the creditors have been denied all benefit of the assets he may obtain a certificate. I am satisfied that it will operate badly, I am satisfied that if the bill becomes a law in that shape it will receive, and justly receive, many comments on its improper character upon this point.

I do not see, unless the party gives his property to his creditors, that the law is to work any benefit at all. Debtors owing a smaller amount than $1,000 can generally make an arrangement with their creditors just as good as can be obtained under this law. To pass it in this shape, turn over the property to the courts, let it be entirely destroyed in this way, without the creditors being benefited, is I think highly improper. I have offered the amendment in good faith, and desire that it shall be adopted if the bill is to be passed.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. FOGG. I move to insert $500 instead of $300 in that clause.

Mr. POLAND. I desire merely to say that in the English system of bankruptcy, which is the one we fashion after more than any other, the one we know the most about, the one that has been longest in operation, where they have had the benefit of more experience than anywhere else, the sum is still smaller than that named in this bill. Fifty pounds is the limit in the English bankrupt laws. It seems to me there can be no harm in leaving this amount where the House left it.

Mr. HENDERSON. Permit me to ask the Senator if the English laws allow voluntary bankruptcy at all?

Mr. POLAND. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON. I was under the impression that they did not. They did not until the last few years I am satisfied, unless it was by the act of 1849 or since that time. Before that I am sure under the English laws there was no such thing as voluntary bankruptcy.

Mr. POLAND. It is in full operation there now.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is a very recent act, then.

Mr. FOGG called for the yeas and nays on the amendment and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 19, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Cragin, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fogg, Foster, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Morrill, Ramsey, Sherman, and Williams—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Conness, Hendricks, Kirkwood, Lane, McDougall, Morgan, Norton, Patterson, Poland, Pomeroy, Ross, Saulsbury, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, Wilson, and Yates—20.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Chandler, Cowan, Creswell, Fowler, Frothinghaysen, Grimes, Guthrie, Nesmith, Nye, Riddle, and Sprague—13.

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will take the question on the amendments collectively unless some Senator asks for a separate vote on some particular amendment. Is any amendment excepted?

Mr. SUMNER. I except the one on page 46.

Mr. GRIMES. That was not agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I understand my colleague's amendment was not agreed to, but the committee's amendment was agreed to; words were struck out on page 46. It is at the bottom of page 46, line ten to line seventeen of section thirty-three. The committee's amendment to strike out was agreed to. I wish to have another vote on that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be excepted. Is any other amendment asked to be excepted? The question, then, will be on the residue of the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The remaining amendments were concurred in.

The Secretary read the excepted amendment, which was on page 46, section thirty-three, line ten, after the word "otherwise" to strike out the following words:

And in all proceedings in bankruptcy commenced after one year from the time this act shall go into operation no discharge shall be granted to a debtor whose assets do not pay fifty per cent. of the claims against his estate, unless the assent in writing of a majority, in number and value, of his creditors who have proved their claims is filed in the case at or before the time of application for discharge.

Mr. SUMNER. On concurring in that amendment I should like to have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. POLAND. In relation to that amendment I have merely to say that the committee had this bill under consideration, and they were entirely unable to see any reason for making this distinction: why the assent of a majority of the creditors should be required to a discharge when the proceeding was commenced more than a year after the passage of this act, when it was not in case the proceedings were commenced within the year. If the Senator from Massachusetts can give any reason he can give what we were not able to discover.

Mr. WILSON. It seems to me that there is a very plain reason. The reason is this: within the year persons who are now bankrupts will have an opportunity to commence proceedings; after a year's time the provision will apply to persons who are not now in a condition of bankruptcy; and I think the distinction a good one and one that ought to exist. I think it will be much safer for the law itself and for the community that it shall exist, because, that being the law, persons engaged in business will be less reckless, more careful of their affairs, finding that they cannot be discharged without paying something to their creditors. This bill applies to men who are already bankrupt, and you allow it to apply to them for a year, and that whole class of men can enter their cases, and then you begin again. The men who are not when the bill passes and for one year are not in a condition of bankruptcy, but after that time become so, are required to pay fifty cents on the dollar, or have the assent of a majority of the creditors in number and amount. I believe it does no injustice to men who are now in a condition of bankruptcy, but applies to operations commenced a year hence.

We have tried that experiment for a quarter of a century in Massachusetts and it works well. Ninety-nine out of every hundred honest men get their discharges without any trouble, whatever they may pay generally. The effect of it is to check wild and reckless operations, to make men more careful in their business affairs, and therefore it is much safer for the great mass of the community. We are to let off now all who are bankrupt; and I know men to-day who ride in their carriages with money covered up who are to be released by this bill, whose creditors, reduced from abundance to poverty, are toiling for day wages—men among my neighbors and friends. There is quite as much suffering in that direction as there is in the other; but this releases the whole class of bankrupts in the country to-day, and applies only to men who shall enter their cases a year hence. I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. CONNESS. There is always a difficulty when you undertake to regulate a general principle by an individual case. The Senator tells us that he knows of some cases—

Mr. WILSON. Will the Senator allow me to say a word?

Mr. CONNESS. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON. I hope the Senator does not undertake to say that because I mentioned a particular case I therefore govern my action on this subject by that case. It is the principle we are adopting, and it was only to illustrate it that I referred to the case of particular men.

Mr. CONNESS. If the honorable Senator had heard me out he would have understood that there was nothing in my allusion that would misrepresent or misplace him. I said that there was always a difficulty where we undertook to try a general principle by an individual case. Is there any objection to that form of illustration by the Senator? The Senator stated that he knew of cases where injustice would result if this provision was not retained as it occurs in the bill originally.

Now, Mr. President, my objection to retaining the provision is, that it is in violation of the very purpose of the act, the purpose sought to be obtained by its passage; namely, it proposes that the bankrupt shall not be released unless his creditors consent in certain cases.

If that is to be the case you may as well not pass this law; you gain by it nothing but that a man who is able to pay fifty cents on the dollar of his indebtedness may be released; but if he is unable to pay that and his creditors will not consent, he may not be released, and therefore, so far as he is concerned, he cannot have the benefit of this act. Well, sir, I apprehend that that would go to the uniformity of the act or the operation of the act. If there may be cases where persons may obtain by fraudulent proceedings a discharge from their obligations under this act, it is our business as law-makers to so fashion the law that that may be prevented; but we must not go to the violation of the very principle of the act we pass for the purpose of defending the community against injustice of the class spoken of.

I hope, Mr. President, that this course will not be taken, and that the amendment made in Committee of the Whole will be affirmatively voted by the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from Vermont asked if there was any good reason for this clause which I have moved to retain. I reply to him very easily: there is a reason, and the reason is found in the first place in the reason of the thing, and in the second place in experience. In the first place, in the reason of the thing, my colleague has already explained that; he has shown the essential equity of the proposition. Can any one show the contrary? The proposition is, that no discharge shall be granted to a debtor whose assets do not pay fifty per cent. of the claims against his estate unless the assent in writing of a majority, both in number and in value, of his creditors is filed in the case before the discharge. Is not that equity? Does it present any serious embarrassment to an honest debtor? I submit not. If his estate fails to pay fifty per cent., then there is the other condition that a majority of his creditors may make the concession of his discharge.

And is it possible to suppose that if a debtor is honest the majority of his creditors will not make the concession of a discharge? I submit that there can be no doubt on that point, therefore the proposition is reasonable in itself. Then I say it is also sustained by experience. Remember the oft-quoted saying of Patrick Henry, when he exclaimed that he had but one lamp by which his feet were guided, and that was the lamp of experience. Now, a Massachusetts Senator may be pardoned for inclining to this cause, following simply the lamp of experience. In the State of Massachusetts we have a well-considered bankrupt system, in which this principle has obtained a place. It has been found to work well. The experience of Massachusetts is therefore in its favor.

I conclude, then, that you have on the side of this proposition both reason and experience.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I desire to amend the proposition by omitting the words "commenced after one year from the time this act shall go into operation," in the eleventh and twelfth lines. I move to amend the text by striking out these words before the vote is taken upon the amendment made in committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As an amendment to the amendment the Senator from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the words named by him.

Mr. POLAND. This is precisely the proposition that has been made once before in committee at least, and two or three times in substance; that is, to make the discharge of the debtor in all cases depend upon the assent of the creditors. It has been voted down three or four times.

In relation to the proposition to strike out this part of the section the committee reported in favor of striking it out because they were unable to see any reason for it, and I have hardly heard any, except the Senators from Massachusetts say that they have such a provision in their State and it has worked well, and they have had it for many years. My friend from Massachusetts seems to suppose that there is to be a different state of things after the passage of this bankrupt law; business is going to be done upon a different principle; men are not going to be likely to fail and become bankrupts, as they have been heretofore. I expect no such thing. I suppose the world will go on very much the same; trade will go; men will be unfortunate; men will fail after the passage of this bankrupt law, as they have done before. Why a man who becomes a bankrupt after the passage of this law and has occasion to apply for the benefits of it should stand upon any different principle, why any different rule should be applied to him, why he should not be entitled to his discharge upon precisely the same ground as the man who has already become bankrupt before the passage of the law or within one year after its passage, is more than the committee were able to see, and more than I am able to see, with all the light that has been cast upon it by both the Senators from Massachusetts.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I made this motion for the very reason just stated by the Senator from Vermont, that I can see no reason for applying a different rule to applicants who may come into court after the 1st of March say of next year and those who may come into court during the one year which will elapse from the passage of this law. If there be any reason for the discrimination based upon time I have failed to perceive it. If my amendment prevails, then the question will come up generally as to all applicants, whether the consent of a majority of the creditors shall be required for their discharge or not, and we can get a distinct and fair vote on that proposition.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment, and on that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. The amendment is to strike out?

Mr. HOWARD. The amendment is to strike out the clause, and those who are in favor of striking out the clause will therefore vote "yea."

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understand the question is whether we shall concur in the amendment made in the Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the question.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Then those who are in favor of the amendment striking out will vote "yea."

Mr. SUMNER. Those who are in favor of retaining the provision will of course vote "nay;" that is, they will vote against the amendment of the committee.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 31, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Chandler, Conness, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Harris, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, McDougall, Morgan, Morrill, Norton, Patterson, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Saulsbury, Sherman, Stewart, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Williams, and Yates—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Cowan, Cragin, Fogg, Foster, Grimes, Henderson, Lane, Sumner, and Wilson—10.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Creswell, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Guthrie, Kirkwood, Nesmith, Nye, Riddle, and Sprague—11.

So the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the amendments made by the committee are disposed of, I have one amendment to suggest.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate and still open to amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The amendment is to strike out what was proposed by the Judiciary Committee to be stricken out on page 4, section three, commencing in the fourth line:

Upon the nomination and recommendation of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

So that the section will read:

That it shall be the duty of the judges of the district courts of the United States within and for the several districts to appoint in each congressional district in said districts one or more registers in bankruptcy, &c.

These registers will be very important officers and they ought to be selected by some person who knows them personally. The register ought to be an honest man, and he ought to be a good business man. I do not know that it will be necessary that he should in all cases be a lawyer; but he should be selected by some person who knows him personally, because he has very much to do with the adjudication. He aids the judge in all proceedings in bankruptcy. In other words, he is an officer of the court, and I think he ought to be appointed by the court. As the bill now stands, the district judge is to appoint the register, but he can only appoint some one who is nominated by the Chief Justice. I submit to Senators that if they desire to make this a good bill that provision ought not to be in it. Take the State of Indiana. The present Chief Justice at one time lived in an adjoining State; but is he presumed to know who will make good registers in the different congressional districts? Is he presumed to be as well acquainted with the lawyers of Indiana as the judge of the district court? Take the State of California. Will any Senator say that the Chief Justice can know who is a suitable man to nominate for register in that State. If the Chief Justice is to nominate, in nearly every case he must do it upon the recommendation of other persons; so that these nominations will come to be political nominations.

I do not want to discuss this, but I feel an interest in this feature of the bill that it shall be made right. Politics has nothing to do with my view of the subject at all; for both the district and circuit judge in Indiana differ with me in politics. Both were appointed by Mr. Lincoln, and both, I believe, at least the district judge, as I understand, sustains the policy of Congress; but I know that he will make good selections of registers; and he is acquainted with the lawyers of the State; he is acquainted with the business men. These appointments ought to be made by the district judge, for the register is an officer under the district judge. Suppose the register proves himself to be unfit for the place or unfaithful in the discharge of his duties, ought not the district judge to remove him at once? And yet he cannot do it if he is to depend upon the pleasure of the Chief Justice.

Mr. JOHNSON. I concur with the honorable member from Indiana that it would be exceedingly injudicious to retain this provision in the bill. We have a district court in Oregon, a district court in California, at an immense distance from the Chief Justice. It is impossible for him to know the lawyers in Oregon or the lawyers in California, such of them as would be likely to be selected.

But it occurs to me there is a constitutional difficulty in this provision. The Constitution provides that all officers whose appointments are mentioned in the Constitution shall be appointed upon the nomination of the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, but that Congress may with reference to other officers vest the appointment in a head of a Department or in a court. There is no authority to vest it in any individual member of a court; but this clause, so far from vesting the appointment in the courts who are mentioned in the section, gives them merely a negative upon the nomination of the Chief Justice. It makes him as much a constituent part of the nominating power as the President is in the cases in which the President, by the Constitution, is to nominate, and the appointment is to be made by him only with the advice and consent of the Senate.

I am opposed to it, therefore, because I think it is perhaps liable to that constitutional objection; but principally because the duty itself is one which, in my judgment, the court is much more able to perform than the Chief Justice of the United States can be. If he is situated here, or wherever may be his locality, he does not go into the circuits, except in his own circuit; he has no knowledge at all of the districts where these officers are to discharge their functions, and he can only know upon recommendations made to him at a distance; and very likely (although he would not, I am sure, tolerate it if he knew it) it might be made a political matter, to the injury of the particular service for which the officer was appointed.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I intended when I rose up to say that the amendment which I now propose was recommended by the Judiciary Committee. It is the amendment of the committee.

Mr. WILLEY. I think there is a great deal more in this proposition than the Senate perhaps are aware or appear to think about it just now, and I should be glad to attract the attention of Senators to it. I do not mean in regard to whether better appointments can be made by the district courts or by nomination of the Chief Justice, although it seems to me very evident that it would be exceedingly inconvenient on the part of the Chief Justice to make nominations for these registers all over the country. There is to be at least one register in every congressional district. That would involve the appointment of upward of two hundred registers, and it might amount to three hundred, because there may be more registers in some congressional districts than one. Now, look how the thing would operate. Here is the Chief Justice engaged in the discharge of his duties. Here are two hundred and forty or perhaps three hundred districts in which registers are to be appointed. There will be competition for these offices no doubt, and hence will come up a swarm of applicants or recommendations to the Chief Justice of the United States from two hundred and forty-one districts in the United States, out of whom he must make a selection of men with whom he has no acquaintance whatever. What does he know about the qualifications in California? What would he know about the qualifications of men in Maine? He must depend at last upon the recommendations of others, and as he would most likely depend upon the recommendation of the district courts, why not give authority to the district courts to appoint their own officers, for these are in some sense officers of the district courts.

My friend from Indiana said that he did not feel disposed to discuss the political aspects of this question. Sir, there, it seems to me, is the importance of it. No man has a higher opinion of the present distinguished gentleman who presides over the Supreme Court of the United States than I have; no man would less presume than I to intimate that he could be influenced by any improper feelings or considerations; but, sir, he is a man, subject to human infirmities, subject to the influence of human passions and motives. Besides, he is not to live forever, and there will be a successor. I ask Senators to reflect one moment whether there is not danger in taking this first step, for that is always the fatal step in a wrong direction, whether there is not danger in doing that which will bring, in the remotest degree, political influences into contact with the Supreme Court of the United States. It was the object of our fathers in organizing our judicial system to place that august tribunal as far as possible from all these influences. Sir, are we not instructed by the agitation of the public mind at this time, are we not instructed by the newspapers, and by what I am pained to see, harsh criticisms upon that court already for leaning toward political influences, or at least being subject to them in some degree, are we not warned to do nothing which would bring them directly in contact with political influences?

Sir, it is in vain to say that political influences will not be brought to bear upon these nominations. It cannot be avoided. It will be vain to attempt to escape bringing these political influences to bear more or less upon the Chief Justice in making these nominations. This will be the first step. If we never make it, there never will be any danger in that direction; and inasmuch as, it seems to me, these appointments can be as well made, if not better made, by the district courts themselves, I beseech Senators let us avoid this great danger of inviting the judiciary into the political arena, or of bringing political influences in any contact with the Supreme Court.

Mr. JOHNSON called for the yeas and nays on the amendment, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 21, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Foster, Fowler, Harris, Hendricks, Johnson, McDougall, Norton, Patterson, Ross, Saulsbury, Sherman, Stewart, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Willey—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Conness, Cragin, Fessenden, Fogg, Grimes, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sumner, Wade, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—21.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Creswell, Frelinghuysen, Guthrie, Nesmith, Nye, Poland, Riddle, and Sprague—10.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I intend to vote against the bill as it now stands. I understand from the best sources that the provision on which we have voted this afternoon was incorporated into the bill as a compromise, and a great number of gentlemen voted for the measure because it was regarded as a compromise. I refer to the provision that has been stricken out in regard to one year's time. By that provision as it passed the House of Representatives all the present debtors in the country within a year could enter their cases and obtain their discharges, and after that, persons who become bankrupt in the country, as the bill is to last, would be required to pay fifty cents on the dollar, or obtain the assent of a majority in number and amount of their creditors, and after that a second or third or fourth time they would have to pay seventy cents on the dollar, or obtain a majority in number and amount of their creditors.

Now, sir, we have stricken out this first provision to stand permanently in the country. We tried that experiment once in my State. We passed a bankrupt bill or an insolvent act; men ran into debt and then took the benefit of the insolvent act. We found the whole system demoralizing both for debtor and creditor. We changed it and required that the debtor should pay fifty cents on the dollar or obtain a majority in number and amount of his creditors to release him. Twenty years of experience proves that system to be eminently wise, and under its operations there can be no question that business affairs are carried on with more caution, with more care than before.

Now, we have stricken this out, and what are we to have? There are tens and tens of thousands of debtors in the country who will take advantage of this act, who want to be released and ought to be released; but we make it a permanent system, and men who two years hence can get anybody to credit them can rush in and take advantage of this act and pay nothing, and in some of the States hold $100,000 of property and nothing can be realized by their creditors, for the exemption laws of some States may enable them to do it and cover it up.

This is the way the matter stands. I think if the bill had stood as it came from the House of Representatives that no great hardship would be imposed on any portion of the people; that after the first year or two we should find it working admirably; we should find that in all parts of the country the practical operation would be to make debtors less reckless and creditors more careful. It would have had an excellent influence upon business operations in the country. Men, instead of going on recklessly when they were in debt, until they squandered everything they had, would see where they stood, and would feel that they had got to pay fifty cents on the dollar or else satisfy their creditors that they had acted honestly. We should have had fault enough found with the bill if we had passed it in the form in which it was passed by the House of Representatives. Gentlemen voted for it in that House, in the form in which it came to us, who desired to have fifty cents paid or no discharge without the assent of creditors hereafter, and to let all persons who wish to take advantage of the act, who are now embarrassed, to do so for one year without being subject to that requirement. The bill passed with their votes; it came here; and we have stricken out that provision. I believe that vote to be wrong. I believe we are starting a system by this bill as it stands that will encourage dishonesty, recklessness, and carelessness in business affairs. If that provision had been retained the debtors of the country who are now debtors, who have been embarrassed for years, would be able to obtain their releases, and then in the future men engaged in business would know that under the national bankrupt law they must pay their creditors fifty cents on the dollar, or they must so conduct their affairs as to satisfy a majority in number and amount of their creditors that they honestly ought to be discharged, and there would be no hardship upon honest men in requiring them to obtain that assent. As it is now I shall not and cannot give my vote to the measure. I shall vote against it.

Mr. COWAN. I have merely a word to say, and I wish to say it before the final vote is taken.

I am opposed to the bill in toto, for other, however, and very different reasons than those given by the Senator from Massachusetts. I am opposed to the bill because it is to be administered through the medium of registers and the United States courts, machinery utterly and totally unable to administer any law of the kind, and which will render it so obnoxious that it will not remain on the statute-book longer than the act of 1841 did; and that went from the books simply because it was administered in the United States courts.

Mr. President, a bankrupt law to be efficacious must be as near to the people as an insolvent law, a stay law, or any other law. You cannot administer any law of this kind in a great State like Pennsylvania, for instance, with the courts one hundred and fifty miles apart: it is utterly impossible. The people cannot get to them. The court becomes merely the medium by which all the rogues and knaves of the country are sifted through in fraud of their creditors; and the creditors in such cases not being able to get into the courts, except very few of them, never get a dividend. I think in western Pennsylvania, under the bankrupt law of 1841, there never was a dividend made; there never was a dollar paid to a creditor; and the creditors, other than those who resided perhaps in the city of Pittsburgh, could not get to the court. How was a man to go a hundred miles who had a claim against a bankrupt, say for $100? He would say at once, "It is not worth while to go for that; I might just as well lose it as go there and give it all to the lawyers, to prevent this fellow from pursuing his fraudulent claim to a discharge;" and hence it is that the creditors give it up, stay at home, and the whole results in a gross and gigantic fraud, which the people will soon repudiate and strike out.

Under the Constitution it is the duty of Congress to pass uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy, just as it is their duty to pass uniform rules of naturalization; but these laws ought to be administered in the State courts, where they can be brought to the doors of the people, and where those whose interests are to be affected by the proceedings in bankruptcy can go into court, and where they can go without such extraordinary expenses as would be incurred by going into the United States courts. If, then, the bill had been framed so as to be administered in the common law courts of the United States, there is no difficulty in the world about it; no necessity in the world why you should create two hundred or three hundred or five hundred or six hundred registers, and cover the country with a swarm of officers. If it had been put, I say, into the State courts and administered through the common law judges of the State courts known to the people, where the business of the country is wont to be administered then the law might have been efficacious.

There is nothing about the law which requires it to be administered in the United States courts. In fact every characteristic of the law would require it to be administered in the State courts, in the common law courts. I know that a great many people entertain the idea that it is like the fugitive-slave law; you could not compel the State courts to administer it. That is not the case; State courts administer the naturalization laws; and why not administer the bankrupt laws? The clause in the Constitution which confers authority over both is in pari materia and almost in hæc verba, almost in the same words.

Mr. President, believing, as I do, that this law will simply become the engine of fraud and corruption, and will become odious to the people, as all laws of the kind must necessarily be when they are carried into strange tribunals, and when they are required to travel one hundred and fifty or two hundred miles before they can get to them, I am opposed to this bill. I agree it may do very well in Rhode Island; it may do very well in Delaware; it might do in a small State where the United States court is convenient; but in a great State like New York, Pennsylvania, or Ohio, to my mind it is as idle a dream as ever was entertained to suppose that you can administer a bankrupt law there and make it satisfactory to the people; and I venture the prediction now, that if you pass this bill it will not remain on your statute-book un repealed two years.

Mr. SUMNER. I shall vote for the bill, but with great reluctance. Two votes of the Senate to-day have gone very far to diminish my interest in the measure, which I have watched with the profoundest sympathy from its first introduction into this Chamber. The vote by which this bill is opened to rebels is one; the other is the vote on which my colleague has commented, which seems to me in its nature improvident at least, if not inequitable. It was only a little while ago that I had the privilege of conversing with two different gentlemen, each of whom I regard as more than respectable authority on this subject. One was a professional gentleman of New York, who had recently visited every one of the rebel States; the other was a very distinguished and philanthropic merchant of the North, who had debts in the South to the amount of a great many tens of thousands of dollars. Both of those gentlemen concurred in recommending the two provisions to which I now allude. Both insisted that this bill, in order to be made properly efficacious and beneficial, must exclude the rebels from its benefit; and they also insisted that a discharge should not be given without the consent of a majority of the creditors where there were not assets to the amount of fifty per cent.

These gentlemen spoke from great knowledge and experience. My own judgment has been in harmony with what I may call their testimony. It is in that spirit that I have acted. I have sought to amend the bill in good faith. I have failed, and for the moment I shall yield. I regret very much the votes of the Senate. I am sure that if the bill becomes a law those votes will impair its value very much; I might almost say incalculably. I do not know that they will not make us regret its passage.

Mr. POLAND. I desire to say one word with reference to what has been said by the Senator from Massachusetts. In relation to his objection that we have failed to incorporate into this bill the test oath, I have no doubt but what the gentleman will change his mind upon sleeping upon it. I cannot believe that that idea will last him twenty-four hours.

Mr. SUMNER. I have slept upon it a great many weeks and months.

Mr. POLAND. In relation to the other question, the objection that the bill does not contain the provision of the Massachusetts insolvent law, of which we have heard so much, I do not regard that as vital; and if it be true, as has been stated, that the members of the House from Massachusetts were induced to vote for the bill because it contained this provision, and the House should non-concur in this amendment of the Senate, I cannot suppose that on the part of the Senate that would be made a division between the two Houses upon which the bill should fail. It certainly would not so far as I am concerned.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. It was read a third time.

Mr. GRIMES. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COWAN (when his name was called) said: I would vote against the bill. I am paired off, however, with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY,] who would vote for the bill, he not being able to come to the Chamber.

Mr. HARRIS, (after first voting in the affirmative.) I desire to change my vote. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Conness, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Foster, Howard, Howe, Johnson, McDougall, Morgan, Norton, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Stewart, Sumner, and Van Winkle—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Cragin, Davis, Fogg, Fowler, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Kirkwood, Lane, Morrill, Patterson, Saulsbury, Sherman, Trumbull, Wade, Wiley, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—22.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Cowan, Creswell, Frelinghuysen, Guthrie, Nesmith, Nye, Riddle, and Sprague—10.

So the bill was rejected.

Mr. CHANDLER and others addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan. Prior to recognizing any Senator, however, the Chair, with the permission of the Senate, will lay before the Senate a message from the President of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. WILSON, and others, addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will not offer the messages if Senators insist on submitting motions.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to the messages being laid before the Senate.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to enter a privileged motion. I wish to enter a motion to reconsider the vote on the bankrupt bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 344, the bill to construct the Niagara ship-canal.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the executive business.

Mr. CHANDLER. Let my motion be put first.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, there being on a division—ayes 25, noes 13; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 5, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

INVESTIGATION OF INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. WINDOM. The Committee on Indian Affairs, who were instructed by the House to make an investigation in regard to the administration of the Indian Bureau, have directed me to make a report. I move that it be re-committed to the committee and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. I also present a minority report on the same subject. I move that the same disposition be made of it.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN FOWLER AND COMPANY.

Mr. BIDWELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution for the relief of John Fowler & Co.; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

TARIFF BILL.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report the tariff bill as amended by the Senate, in such a manner as to exhibit the rates of duty imposed on the several articles under the tariff in force on the 1st day of April, 1861; on the 1st day of January, 1865; and thereafter proposed by House bill No. 718, as amended by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of Ways and Means are in session on the tariff bill, and not one of the members is now present.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. This is only for the convenience of members when they come to consider the bill.

Mr. JENCKES. I object.

MATILDA VICTOR.

On motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of Matilda Victor, on condition that copies of them were left.

FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

Mr. FINCK, by unanimous consent submitted the following report; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed:

The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the following resolution:

Resolved, That the franking privilege be continued to the members of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, the same as if the Fortieth Congress did not meet until the first Monday in December next.

Report that they have duly considered the subject. The forty-second section of an act to amend the laws relating to the Post Office Department, provides that the authority to frank mail matter is conferred upon and limited to the following persons:

1. The President of the United States, by himself or his Private Secretary.
2. The Vice President of the United States.
3. The chiefs of the several Executive Departments.
4. Such principal officers, being heads of bureaus, or chief clerks of each Executive Department, to be used only for official communications, as the Postmaster General shall by regulation prescribe.
5. Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States, including Delegates from Terriories, the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, to cover correspondence to and from them, and all printed matter issued by authority of Congress, and all speeches, proceedings, and debates in Congress, and all printed matter sent to them; their franking privilege to commence with term for which they are elected, and to expire the first Monday of December following such term of office, &c.

And it is further provided in said section: "That the franking privilege heretofore granted shall be limited to packages weighing not exceeding four ounces; except petitions to Congress and congressional or executive documents, and such publications or books as have or may be published, procured, or purchased by order of either House of Congress or a joint resolution of the two Houses, which shall be considered as public documents, and entitled to be franked as such; and except also seeds, cuttings, roots, and scions, the weight of the package of which may be fixed by regulation of the Postmaster General."

Mr. FINCK. By this section the franking privilege to Senators and Representatives in Congress, &c., does not expire until the first Monday of December following such term of office. The committee are therefore of opinion that no further legislation, such as is contemplated by said resolution, is necessary, and ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

RECEPTION OF GENERAL PHILIP H. SHERIDAN.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure of announcing to the House of Representatives the presence in this Hall of "Phil. Sheridan," whom every man writes down "a soldier." [Great applause upon the floor and in the galleries.] I move that he be introduced to this House by the Speaker, and for that purpose the House take a recess for five minutes.

The motion, amid applause, was unanimously agreed to.

A recess was accordingly taken, and Major General Philip H. Sheridan, United States Army, in company with General U. S. Grant, was escorted by the Speaker and Mr. SCHENCK to the Speaker's stand.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, it affords me peculiar pleasure by your order this day to introduce to you Major General Philip H. Sheridan. [Applause.] While this country will cherish in the heart of hearts of all loyal people the achievements upon fields of danger and of death of all its glorious defenders, they can never forget one who was brave among the bravest, true among the truest, and the recollection of whose deeds will survive as long as history shall endure. I present to you General Philip H. Sheridan. [Great applause.]

General SHERIDAN. Gentlemen, I am much obliged to you for this very kind and unexpected reception. [Renewed applause.]

The Speaker then presented individually the members of the House to General Grant and Major General Sheridan.

The time for the recess having expired, the Speaker resumed the chair, and called the House to order.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, notifying the House that that body had passed a bill (S. No. 461) for the grant of land to the State of California to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

It further announced that the Senate had indefinitely postponed House bill No. 84, to regulate the time and place of holding the district court of the United States within and for the district of Maine.

SAMUEL DOWNING.

Mr. McINDOE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill granting additional pension to Samuel Downing, the last surviving soldier of the revolutionary war; which was read a first and second time.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Samuel Downing, the last surviving soldier of the revolutionary war, upon the pension-roll for additional pension at the rate of $500 per annum from the 3d of September, 1866, to continue during the remainder of his life.

Mr. MARVIN. Mr. Downing resides in Saratoga county; he is one hundred and five years of age, and is the last surviving soldier of the Revolution now on the pension-roll. I am personally acquainted with him, and know him to be a worthy man. He deserves of his country this small sum as a testimonial of the respect and veneration in which he is held by a grateful people—a testimonial to one who fought with Washington for our independence. I trust there will not be a dissenting voice in this House against this act of justice to this old man.

Mr. McINDOE moved the previous question.

The previous question was seconded.

Mr. ANCONA. I would like to suggest an amendment to this bill. This House passed a bill a few days ago for the relief of the last surviving soldier of the revolutionary war, and I think this should be amended so as to read, "one of the last surviving soldiers."

Mr. McINDOE. I have no objection.

The amendment was accordingly made.

The main question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McINDOE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, ordered to be printed, and made the special order for Saturday next after the morning hour, and from day to day till disposed of.

VACANCY ON A COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints to fill the vacancy on the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, occasioned by the death of Mr. Johnson, the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. CAMPBELL.]

FORTIFICATION BILL.

Mr. ROLLINS. I call for the regular order.

The House resumed the special order, being the consideration of the bill pending at the adjournment last evening, (H. R. No. 919,) making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repairs of certain fortifications and other works of defense, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, the pending question being on agreeing to the report of the Committee of the Whole, recommending that the enacting words be stricken out.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 67, noes 44.

Mr. LYNCH demanded the yeas and nays; and tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Messrs. LYNCH and SCOTFIELD.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes twenty-eight.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 87, nays 66, not voting 47; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Ancona, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baxter, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Campbell, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cooper, Cullom, DeFrees, Delano, Deming, Denison, Eckley, Eggleston, Eldridge, Farquhar, Finck, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Griswold, Aaron Harding, Abner C. So the enacting clause was stricken out.

Mr. SCOFIELD moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAY OF A DECEASED MEMBER.

Mr. ANCONA, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to pay to Mrs. M. E. Johnson, widow of the late Hon. Philip Johnson, the remainder of salary that would have been due him up to the 4th of March, 1867.

Mr. ANCONA moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

POST OFFICE AND CUSTOM-HOUSE, NASHVILLE.

Mr. CAMPBELL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill providing for the erection of a building in the city of Nashville, State of Tennessee, suitable for the accommodation of the post office, the Federal court, and the custom-house in said city.

JAIL IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. DARLING, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be requested to confer with the Secretary of the Interior as to the propriety of adopting the plans of the new jail for the District which were recommended for adoption by the three officials doing business in the Interior Department, and also to inquire the reason why a specification has not been submitted with the plans for contractors to estimate on, as the act requires; and that the said committee be authorized to send for persons and papers, and report by bill or otherwise, as they shall consider necessary, so as to insure a proper jail for the District.

Mr. DARLING moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I desire to ask the consent of the House to withdraw from the Committee of Claims the memorial of Mr. Dainese, which I referred to it some days since, and to ask that it be referred to a special committee of five.

Mr. COBB. I object.

DEATH OF PRESIDENT LINCOLN.

Mr. BANKS. I present the correspondence of the State Department with the Government of Brazil in reference to the death of President Lincoln. I move that it be printed, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ROLLINS. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business proceeds with the call of the committees, resuming the call where it was suspended yesterday, with the Committee on Military Affairs.

STEPHEN E. JONES.

Mr. BLAINE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a joint resolution for the relief of Stephen E. Jones; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution was read. It directs the Paymaster General to pay to Stephen E. Jones full pay and allowances as a first lieutenant of cavalry for the period during which he actually served as aid-de-camp on the staffs of General Nelson and General George H. Thomas, prior to the time when he was mustered into the service of the United States.

Mr. BLAINE. I move the previous question on the joint resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I call for the reading of the report, if there be one. The joint resolution only discloses the fact that this gentleman served on the staffs of two generals.

Mr. BLAINE. He actually served and never received a cent of pay for the better part of a year, as the report will show.

The report was read. It sets forth quite briefly that Stephen E. Jones was appointed on the staff of General Nelson when that officer was ordered to Kentucky in 1861, under a misapprehension of the power of the commanding officer; that he was subsequently transferred to the staff of General Thomas when that officer relieved General Nelson, and was finally appointed an additional aid-de-camp by the President, with the rank of captain, but has never been paid for the eleven months which he actually served prior to muster into the United States service.

Mr. CLARK, of Ohio. Will it be in order to refer the resolution to the Committee of Claims?

Mr. BLAINE. I decline to yield, Mr. Speaker, for any such motion. The resolution, I think, explains itself, and the report which has just been read leaves nothing to be said. The case on all grounds of equity is complete. In framing the resolution and drafting the report I was guided simply by the official papers which I obtained at the War Department; not allowing myself to be governed by any personal knowledge or prepossessions in regard to the gentleman in whose behalf the resolution is submitted. It is perfectly fair, however, to say, in support of that resolution and report, that I know something personally of Captain Jones, and his record in the war is one in the highest degree honorable to him as a gentleman and a patriot. The papers in the case show that he earned the esteem and confidence of all the officers under whom he served, and among them were some of the first in the American Army.

Before moving the previous question on the final passage of the resolution it may be proper to say that, on grounds of general equity, Mr. Jones ought to receive the pay of captain for the time specified; but the law would only allow the pay of a first lieutenant of cavalry, that being the highest grade to which an aid of General Nelson could be commissioned. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. BLAINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EQUALIZATION OF BOUNTIES.

Mr. SCHENCK. The Committee on Military Affairs have instructed me to report back a number of memorials on the subject of equalization of bounties and ask that the committee be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be laid on the table; the committee having reported a general bill upon that subject.

The motion was agreed to.

— ARMY SUTLERS.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am also instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back a joint resolution to repeal section twenty-five of the act to increase and fix the peace military establishment, and ask that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be laid on the table. This is a proposition to repeal that portion of the Army bill passed at the last session of this Congress which provides for dispensing with sutlers in the Army, and also providing that what have hitherto been the duties of sutlers in supplying soldiers shall be performed through the subsistence department.

The motion was agreed to.

ENGINEER QUARTERMASTER SERGEANT.

Mr. SCHENCK, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill to fix the pay of the quartermaster sergeant of the battalion of Engineers; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read at length. It provides that from and after the passage of this act the pay and allowances of the quartermaster sergeant of the battalion of Engineers of the Army of the United States shall be the same as those allowed by law to the sergeant major of that battalion.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

VOLUNTEER SERVICE CERTIFICATES.

Mr. SCHENCK, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill providing for the issue of certificates of service to officers and soldiers of volunteers; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read. The first section provides that the President of the United States shall cause to be furnished, upon application, to every officer who has been regularly mustered into the volunteer service in either the Army or the Navy of the United States during the late war for the suppression of the rebellion, and who has been honorably discharged therefrom, a certificate neatly engrossed on parchment, which shall set forth the date of the entry of the officer into such service, his rank, and the date of his discharge therefrom.

The second section provides that in case of the death of any such officer his legal representatives shall be entitled to receive a certificate as aforesaid.

The third section provides that in any case where clear and full proof shall be made to the Secretary of War to his satisfaction, and in such form as shall be prescribed by him, by any enlisted man who was mustered as a volunteer into the Army of the United States and afterward honorably discharged therefrom, having served any time between the 19th of April, 1861, and the 12th day of April, 1865, that his discharge has been lost without fault of his own, the Secretary shall cause to be issued to such person a certificate in lieu of such discharge, which certificate shall not however be competent to be used as evidence in support of any claim against the Government; and such qualifications restricting the use of such certificate shall be distinctly expressed in the body of the certificate.

Section four provides that in like manner and under the same conditions and restrictions as are contained in the foregoing section, a certificate may be issued in the case of any soldier who is deceased on application made by his proper representatives.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. SCHENCK. If it is desired, I can explain in a few moments the object of this bill. A great many volunteer officers have left the service, indeed I may say all of them have left the service, with simply an acceptance of their resignations or some record in the War Office without anything in a permanent form to show they have served the country. A joint resolution was referred to the committee providing for giving a small certificate, neatly engrossed on parchment, to those officers, to be preserved by themselves and their families. The committee have deemed it proper to report a bill embracing not only the provisions of the joint resolution, but the further provision that where a soldier has lost his discharge he also shall have some certificate given to him in lieu of the discharge, that certificate, however, not to be used for any other purpose.

The committee have been opposed entirely to the issuing of duplicate discharges or certificates in lieu of discharges, to be used for the purpose of collecting bounties, pensions, or anything of that kind, because of the door that would be opened for fraud. But the committee have, in another bill, provided that upon application made for bounty, when the discharge is lost, proof to supply the absence of the discharge shall be admitted to sustain the claim. Thus the soldier may collect his bounty hereafter, as he collects his pension now, upon proof of his identity and of the loss of the discharge. This bill relates to an entirely different subject, and is designed to give to the soldier a permanent parchment certificate as a memorial of his honorable service.

Mr. STEVENS. Is this certificate to be of any avail to the soldier except as a mere memorandum?

Mr. SCHENCK. That is all.

Mr. STEVENS. The difficulty now occurring, as I know, almost every day, is that where soldiers have lost their discharges, as many have, although they are recorded in the proper archives here, the authorities refuse to furnish the soldiers copies or to allow them access to the records, so that they may be enabled to recover what is due them by the Government. I trust that this difficulty will be provided for.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have already explained to the House that it is fully provided for in its appropriate place. If the gentleman will look at the bounty bill, which is now a special order and will come up immediately after the civil service bill, he will find that the ninth section provides for that whole matter. But this bill has a different object—to give the soldier something to preserve as a memorial of his service.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF PENSION LAWS.

On motion of Mr. SCHENCK, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of James W. Webb, asking for an amendment of the pension laws; and the same was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

LOST DISCHARGES.

On motion of Mr. SCHENCK, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Bernard Quinn and others, asking for some legislation upon the subject of lost discharges; and the same was laid on the table.

DUPLICATE DISCHARGES.

On motion of Mr. SCHENCK, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Lucius E. Marshall, of Harrisville, Wisconsin, asking for the passage of a law to provide for the issuing of duplicate discharges; and the same was laid on the table.

PAY OF DISCHARGED OFFICERS.

On motion of Mr. SCHENCK, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of citizens of Jefferson county, Pennsylvania, for a modification of the law giving pay proper to certain discharged officers; and the same was laid on the table.

ABOLITION OF SUTLERS.

On motion of Mr. SCHENCK, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the remonstrance of J. D. Stevenson against the abolition of sutlers in the Army; and the same was laid on the table.

ADDITIONAL BOUNTY.

Mr. SCHENCK. The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of soldiers of the sixty-third Ohio volunteer infantry, asking for additional bounty, have directed me to report it back, and move that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be laid on the table, as the matter is already provided for in the general bill reported by the committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question: whether his committee expect during the present session to bring in an adequate bounty bill?

Mr. SCHENCK. Such a bill has already been reported, has been printed twice, with and without amendments, and is the first business in order after the civil service bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. Do the Committee on Military Affairs intend to press that bill to its passage?

Mr. SCHENCK. We do intend to press it as strongly as we can.

IMPRISONED UNION SOLDIERS.

Mr. SCHENCK. The Committee on Military Affairs have directed me to report back a joint resolution for the relief of Union soldiers now in prison in the United States for minor offenses, together with a communication on the subject from the War Department. The committee think no legislation necessary, and have directed me to move that they be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, and that the joint resolution be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

BOUNTY, ETC.

Mr. SCHENCK, from the same committee, also reported back sundry bills, petitions, &c., in regard to the bounty law, &c., covered by general law; which were laid on the table.

FORT LEAVENWORTH MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. SCHENCK, from the same committee, reported back House bill No. 942, donating a portion of the Fort Leavenworth military reservation for the exclusive use of a public road, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill provides that a strip of land one hundred feet in width along the southern boundary of the Fort Leavenworth military reservation, in the State of Kansas, extending from the Missouri river to the western boundary thereof, shall be set apart for the perpetual and exclusive use of a public road.

Mr. SCHENCK. The committee have reported this after an investigation of all the facts and papers in the case.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TRANSFER OF INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back House bill No. 960, to restore the jurisdiction of Indian affairs to the War Department. The House having already passed an amendment to another bill covering this subject, I move that this bill be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was laid on the table; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRIZE MONEY FOR SIGNAL CORPS MEN.

Mr. SCHENCK, from the same committee reported a bill to authorize the payment of prize money to certain officers and enlisted men of the Signal corps of the Army; which was read a first and second time.

The bill directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to pay to the officers and enlisted men of the Signal corps of the Army who performed duty in the fleet under the command of Admiral Farragut, while that fleet was engaged in action in Mobile Bay on the 5th of August, 1864, from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sum or sums of prize money to each respectively as will be equal to what has been allowed in distribution to officers and sailors of the Navy of corresponding rank, the same as if their names had in any case been borne upon the ship's books.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Does this appropriation come from the prize money, or is it an additional appropriation from the Treasury?

Mr. SCHENCK. It will probably come out of the prize money which has accumulated at the Treasury Department. We consulted the Fourth Auditor's office, and it is not exactly certain how the prize money has been distributed.

I will say that several officers and men belonging to the Signal corps were detailed at the request of Admiral Farragut to serve on the vessels in the action in Mobile Bay. In the naval operations these officers and men exposed themselves, doing good service and received the thanks of the naval commander. When the prize money came to be distributed they were left out, because the law provides prize money shall only be distributed to those who are borne upon the ships' books. The committee at first were not disposed to regard the equities in the case, or to report favorably, supposing it to be the first instance of the kind and would be establishing a precedent, but it appeared afterward, in the case of Admiral Porter's squadron, payment had been made to signal officers and men serving with that squadron, the precaution having been taken to enter their names on the books, which was not done in this case. Prize money also was paid to the officers and soldiers of Harrison's army who served in 1812-15, with Commodore Perry upon Lake Erie. The committee looked into the facts of the case, and recommend the passage of this bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. KETCHAM, from the Committee on Military Affairs, made adverse reports on the following cases; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed:

Resolutions to consolidate the Census Bureau and Provost Marshal's Bureau; petition of Edward Kunkle; memorial of W. A. Howard; and petition of Selina Coc, widow of S. B. R. Coe.

JAMES KELLEY.

Mr. KETCHAM, from the same committee, reported a joint resolution for the payment of Captain James Kelley, of the sixteenth United States infantry; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution directs the payment of a sum equal to the pay, allowances, and emoluments of captain of infantry in active service from the 24th of June, 1864, till the 31st of October, 1866, in full settlement of his claim.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. If there is a report in this case I would like to have it read.

The report was read.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KETCHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JUDGE ADVOCATE'S CORPS.

Mr. BLAINE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill to amend section twelve, chapter two hundred and ninety-nine, of the laws of the first session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress; which was read a first and second time.

The bill amends the section aforesaid by repealing all after and including the words "until otherwise provided by law," so as to place the judge advocates thereby authorized to be retained in service upon the same footing in respect to tenure of office and otherwise as other officers of the Army of the United States.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I would like to know what this is about.

Mr. BLAINE. I will send to the desk a communication from the Judge Advocate General to the Secretary of War, which explains the whole matter.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF MILITARY JUSTICE,
WASHINGTON, D. C., January 19, 1867.

SIR: The undersigned, Judge Advocate General of the Army, has the honor to submit the accompanying draft of a proposed enactment, and the following suggestions in support of the recommendation that the provisions thereof become law.

The object of the legislation desired, is to complete and settle the organization of the Judge Advocate's corps of the Army upon a basis called for by the needs of the service and sanctioned by experience.

It is sought, without increased expenditure, without multiplication of officers, and without extension or alteration of the functions of the Department, to secure to the military establishment, while it may be secured, the permanent effectiveness of a branch of the service comparatively insignificant in cost and numbers, but indispensable to the interests of the Army, and the value of which is liable to be irreparably impaired unless legislation shall consolidate and preserve its force.

The plan offered simply places the officers authorized by the Army bill of last session to be retained upon the same footing with other officers of the establishment. The design is merely to insure, in the only mode in which it can be done, the maintenance of a small corps of subordinates in this Department, who, qualified by capacity and culture, have been trained, by years of labor, to the duties which are required to be performed, and whose services, while they cannot be spared without serious and, it is confidently affirmed, incurable detriment to the interests of the Government, are invested with a value which must be sacrificed unless their tenure of office is now made the same as that of other officers of the Army.

The following are respectfully submitted as a few of the considerations thought to imperatively call for the adoption of the provision suggested:

1. Certainly not less than four or five Judge advocates of the number authorized to be retained, will, for an indefinite period, be needed in the Bureau of Military Justice, for the performance of current labors connected with its ordinary routine functions. For a comprehensive exhibit of the present and anticipated business of this bureau, reference is respectfully made to the following paragraph of my last report, October 8, 1866:

"The operations of the bureau during this period (about eleven months) are briefly presented by the following summary:

"1. Number of records of general courts-martial and military commissions received, reviewed, and filed, eight thousand one hundred and forty-eight.
"2. The number of special reports made as to the regularity of judicial proceedings, the pardon of military offenders, the remission or commutation of sentences; and upon the miscellaneous subjects and questions referred for the opinion of the bureau; including also letters of instruction upon military law and practice to judge advocate, reviewing officers, &c., four thousand and eight.
"3. The number of records of military courts received at this bureau reached a minimum soon after the passage of the late Army bill. Since that time these records have continued to increase with the increase of the Army; and their number, as also the amount of the other business of the office as an advisory branch of the War Department, will continue to be augmented until the peace establishment shall be completely organized and the new Army be fully recruited. The fact that in a large class of important cases commanders of departments and armies are not authorized to execute the sentences in time of peace, and that such cases can no longer be summarily disposed of without a reference to the Executive, will also require from this bureau a very considerable number of reports to be made to the President which heretofore have not been called for. The aggregate business, therefore, of the office will not be reduced in proportion to the reduction of the military force."

It is to be added that since the date of this report the business of the bureau has, as was anticipated, continued to increase, both in the number of judicial records required to be reviewed, and in the amount of the varied miscellaneous cases and questions of law referred to it for consideration and report. At the present time there is found ample employment for the Judge advocates now detailed as assistants in the bureau, and it is believed that the services of none of them could well be dispensed with.

2. It is found absolutely essential to the accuracy, uniformity, and expedition of the administration of military justice that an accomplished and instructed officer of this corps be assigned to duty at the headquarters of each of the most important commands into which the national territory is geographically divided. This distribution which is substantially impracticable without the legislation asked, will employ, necessarily and usefully, for many years at least, three or four more Judge advocates.

It is also of very great importance that several of these officers be constantly available for detail on courts-martial in cases requiring unusual care; for assignment to special temporary duty, in investigations and like service requiring legal as well as military knowledge and experience; and for such inspections in the line of the department business as only trained Judge advocates are suitable for.

For these, among other well-considered reasons, I feel it my duty to recommend the passage of a law conferring the same status upon the corps of ten Judge advocates as is held by the general staff of the Army, as provided in the draft, which is herewith submitted, whereby the discrimination against this corps alone is simply removed.

These views are the result of the experience of this bureau in connection with the administration of military justice, and are submitted for your consideration, and in the hope that it may be agreeable to you to refer them to the consideration of the Military Committee of Congress.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. HOLT,
Judge Advocate General.

Hon. E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

Mr. ROSS. I would ask if this is regarded by the Military Committee as one of the necessary steps to make a military despotism in this country?

Mr. BLAINE. The report just read is very clear and explicit, and nothing I can say will add to it. If gentlemen will not listen to what the judge advocate writes, I am sure they will not listen to what I may say. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BLAINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. SITGREAVES, from the Committee on Military Affairs, made an adverse report on the memorial of Robert A. Constable, of the Ohio volunteers; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

GOVERNMENT LAND AT HARPER'S FERRY.

Mr. BINGHAM, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill to authorize the Secretary of War to convey certain lots in Harper's Ferry; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, authorizes the Secretary of War to convey by deed in fee-simple the lots of ground in Harper's Ferry, in West Virginia, which have heretofore been granted for the use of churches and for charitable purposes, so as to secure their permanent use and possession for the same purposes and no others.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BINGHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PURCHASE OF DAVID'S ISLAND.

Mr. BINGHAM, from the same committee, reported a joint resolution for the purchase of David's Island, New York harbor; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution authorizes the Secretary of War to purchase for the Government of the United States David's Island, in New York harbor, for the sum of $38,500, in accordance with the terms and conditions of the lease with Simeon Leland.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move the previous question.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I would like to hear some explanation of the necessity of this purchase.

Mr. BINGHAM. I withdraw the previous question and will explain it to the gentleman very briefly.

Mr. ROSS. I rise to a point of order. I submit that this bill makes an appropriation and must have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. The bill provides that the Secretary of War shall purchase this island, but there will have to be an appropriation made in some other bill to pay for it.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will state that this island is now in the occupancy, under lease, of the Government of the United States, as it was deemed essential for the use of the Government, and fixtures have been erected upon it by the Government to the amount perhaps of half the cost of the island under the terms of the lease. A friend tells me that the fixtures amount to more than the entire sum named in the bill.

By the terms of the lease the Government of the United States is permitted and privileged to purchase this property at this sum, provided the contract is concluded before the first day of next April. This bill is recommended by the Secretary of War, doubtless on the ground that the purchase is essential for the use of the Government, and on the further ground that unless we avail ourselves of the privileges secured to us by this lease the Government will have to pay much more for it.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. Let me state that David's Island is not in the harbor of New York. It is on Long Island sound, twenty miles from New York.

Mr. SCHENCK. They call it in New York harbor, although I believe it lies on the sound opposite New Rochelle.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. It is not in New York harbor.

Mr. SCHENCK. I think it would be well to amend the bill by substituting for "in New York harbor" the words "on Long Island sound." I move that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. With the permission of my colleague, [Mr. BINGHAM,] I will add one word. This island is now in the occupation of the Government, under a lease, and has valuable buildings upon it. Under that lease the Government has the privilege of taking it at the appraisement made five years ago of $38,500, which was regarded by all parties as exceedingly cheap. Some newspaper correspondent telegraphed to New York that the Committee on Military Affairs were going to report in favor of the purchase of this island, and a gentleman in New York offered for it twice the price that the Government is to pay under the appraisement of five years ago.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I have always been taught during my life-time that anything you did not want was dear at any price, and I believe that to be true. This is a proposition for the purchase of an island on which there is a hospital, which during the pendency of the war was very useful; but now that the war is over I do not consider that a hospital at that point is at all necessary. Because somebody believes this island is worth double what the United States Government can obtain it for, that is no reason why the Government should speculate in that manner. At this time, when economy is so necessary in the administration of the Government, I do not think we should buy unnecessary islands or any land whatever that we can possibly do without. I therefore move that the bill be laid—

Mr. BINGHAM. No, sir; the gentleman cannot have the floor to make any motion of that sort.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Very well; I want to take no advantage of the courtesy of the gentleman; but I want a thorough ventilation of the subject.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have no doubt from what has already transpired that the House is fully advised, from any view that can be taken of this matter, that it is to the peculiar advantage of the Government to avail itself of the privileges secured to it alone by the existing lease. If the Government shall not need the island hereafter it can sell it, after having acquired the title to it, for twice the amount it will now have to pay for it. We should bear in mind, also, that the permanent structures upon the island erected by the Government are worth twofold the price proposed to be given for it.

Mr. SPALDING. I would ask my colleague [Mr. BINGHAM] if he desires the Government to become a speculator in land?

Mr. BINGHAM. Not at all; the Government has use for the island.

Mr. SPALDING. If there is need of the island, that is one thing.

Mr. DARLING. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BINGHAM. I cannot yield now; the Committee on Military Affairs has much business to dispose of and is limited as to time. I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded.

The question was upon ordering the main question to be now put.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I move that the bill be laid on the table.

The question was taken; and upon a division, there were—ayes 41, noes 47; no quorum voting.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 64, nays 73, not voting 53; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Beaman, Brandegee, Campbell, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Cooper, Culion, Darling, Delano, Dumont, Eckley, Eldridge, Finch, Glossbender, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Harris, Hawley, Hill, Hise, Hogan, Holmes, Hotchkiss, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbard, Hulburd, Kerck, George V. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rousseau, Schenck, Sitgreaves, Taber, Nelson Taylor, Thayer, Upson, Van Aernum, Bart Van Horn, Hamilton Ward, William B. Washburn, Williams, and Winfield—73.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Banks, Benjamin, Boutwell, Boyer, Buckland, Chanler, Conkling, Cook, Culver, Dawson, Denison, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Goodyear, Grinnell, Hale, Hayes, Asahel W. Thomas, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, Whaley, James F. Wilson, Woodbridge, and Wright—53.

So the bill was not laid on the table.

The question recurred upon ordering the main question; and being taken, the main question was ordered.

The joint resolution was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. Upon that question I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. BINGHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired.

TEXAS ACCOUNTS AND CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a resolution of the House of the 17th ultimo, relative to the accounts of the State of Texas with the United States; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL BANK TAXES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a resolution of the House of the 28th ultimo, relative to the amount of taxes annually paid by national banking associations to the United States and to the several States; which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

MASSACRE NEAR FORT PHIL. KEARNEY.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, in answer to House resolution of January 29, 1867, requesting information concerning the massacre of United States troops by Indians near Fort Phil. Kearney; which, on motion of Mr. WINDOM, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed an act (S. No. 538) for the relief of the widow and children of Henry E. Morse, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, an act (H. R. No. 902) to declare the sense of an act entitled "An act to restrict the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, and to provide for the payment of certain demands for quartermasters' stores and subsistence supplies furnished to the Army of the United States."

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KASSON. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the President's message. I make this motion in order to enable the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOOPER] to speak upon the question of the currency. After he shall have concluded his remarks, I shall ask the Committee of the Whole to proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The committee can lay aside the President's message at any time, and then the special order will come up for consideration.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes fifty-five, noes not counted.

So the motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. GARFIELD in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the President's annual message.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I propose to speak upon the bill reported from the bank committee, which was made a special order for the 18th December last, but which has not yet been reached in consequence of the pressure of other business before the House. I feel some hesitation in commencing the discussion of this bill to amend the national banking law, as it is evident that great diversity of opinion prevails in the House, and throughout the country, not only in regard to the provisions of the bill, but in reference to the whole subject of the national banks. The discussion, therefore, when the bill comes up for consideration, is not unlikely to take a wide range, and cover the whole subject of the currency in the future of the country.

The principal object of the bill is to provide the power which experience has shown to be necessary to enforce the requirements of the original law by enlarging the authority of the Comptroller in cases of neglect or refusal on the part of the banks to conform to those requirements.

It renders some provisions of the law more clear and definite; and it prescribes the mode of proceeding by receivers who may be appointed to close up the business of a bank.

It requires all the banks in the cities named as places for the redemption of circulating notes to redeem at New York, not only their own circulation, but also the circulation of any bank for which they act as redeeming agents.

It prohibits the banks from including and reporting compound-interest Treasury notes, or any balance due them which bears interest, as part of their reserve of lawful money.

It changes the law in reference to usurious interest to the forfeiture of the whole debt, instead of the forfeiture of the amount of interest, as prescribed in the present law.

It provides circulating notes for new banks organized under the law by scaling down the proportions to the existing banks, and requires any excess over the new allotment of circulating notes to be returned to the Comptroller.

It reduces the national taxation on the circulation of the banks to half of one per cent. per annum, instead of one per cent. as provided in the present law; the tax of half of one per cent. on deposits is continued; and the tax of half of one per cent. on the capital of the banks is repealed.

These are the principal amendments proposed by this bill, but there are various changes of less importance to carry out more effectually the object and intention of the bank act.

One of the objects originally assigned in favor of the law authorizing the creation of the national banks was the benefit the Government would derive in negotiating loans, by making them the basis of the bank circulation, thereby producing a direct demand for a large amount of Government bonds, and securing for them, at least in the minds of our own people, the prestige of being recognized as the highest form of moneyed security in the country.

The returns published, of October 1, 1866, show $426,000,000 as the amount of United States securities, belonging to the national banks; of which over $331,000,000 were deposited in the Treasury as security for their circulating notes. It could hardly be deemed wise and expedient, at this time when it is so desirable to bring about a settled condition of the currency and finances, to disturb this large investment by requiring the national banks to be wound up, and their notes to be withdrawn from circulation to substitute United States legal-tender notes in place of them, as was proposed in some resolutions offered and voted down before the recess of Congress, and since then proposed in a bill by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.] So great a change could not be effected at a time like this without producing much embarrassment to the industry of the country.

I cannot doubt that it is the settled opinion of this Congress that the amount of circulating notes of the national banks should not be increased beyond the $300,000,000 now prescribed in the law. If more paper money is needed, which I do not believe, it would, in my opinion, be far better to increase the legal-tender notes issued by the Government, so that the profit to be derived from any increase of the paper circulation would be reserved for the Government. This would remove the inducement of private interest to favor any such increase. I was opposed in the last session to the recommendation of the Comptroller of the Currency to withdraw $100,000,000 of legal-tender notes and issue in place of them an equal amount of bonds bearing interest at six per cent. in coin, on which the banks should be authorized to issue $90,000,000 more of circulating notes. I should be in favor of withdrawing all the circulating notes of the national banks, and substituting legal-tender Government notes for them, in preference to an increase of the amount of bank notes, believing, as I do, that the amount of $300,000,000 now authorized is as much if not more than the banks can sustain, if we are ever to resume specie payments as was contemplated at no very distant future when the law was passed for the creation of the national banks. If we are to have irredeemable paper money as the permanent currency of this country, I would prefer to have it all issued by the Government, that the whole profit of it may be for the benefit of the Government, and its issue controlled by the Treasury Department under regulations prescribed by law.

The issue of the legal-tender notes when first proposed, and which I earnestly advocated, was represented to be a temporary measure to meet the exigencies of the Government. The national banks were not then organized; in fact the law had not been passed to authorize those banks. The Government legal-tender notes were not proposed to take the place of coin, though the law declared they should "be received the same as coin, at their par value, in payment for any loans that may be hereafter sold or negotiated by the Secretary of the Treasury." It may be said there was no coin then in circulation. The currency of the country at that time consisted of the notes of State banks, which had all suspended specie payments, with most of the coined money of the country locked up in their vaults, by the sale of which the banks afterward realized a large profit in legal-tender notes. The question then presented was, whether the Government should borrow State bank notes at a high rate of interest, for the payment of the Army and for carrying on the war, or whether they should issue for that purpose notes of their own, without any cost for interest. This latter alternative was adopted; and the legal-tender notes furnished to the Treasury over seven hundred millions of money, nearly five hundred millions of which was without any cost for interest, at a time when the Government was in most pressing need. It did more; it stimulated industry, and provided the people of this country with the ability to loan the Government $2,000,000,000 to continue the war until armed rebellion was conquered, and the power and authority of the Government was asserted and recognized throughout the whole country.

It cannot be denied, however, that this was attended by many serious evils, which were subsequently developed. It operated unequally and unjustly on different interests. The great increase of paper money, while it stimulated every kind of industry, also stimulated speculation in every direction. The nominal value of property was enhanced to a fearful extent, to the great injury of all those who derived their support from wages, salaries, and fixed incomes; debtors were enabled to discharge their obligations in a currency depreciated at times to more than half its value, at the time the debt was incurred. The mere fluctuations in the value of the currency impoverished some, while it enriched others, and set at defiance all calculations of prudence in business. The profits of speculation were for a time so large, that the slow patient gains of labor and industry became distasteful. The cities were crowded with gambling speculators in gold and stocks and merchandise, and fraud and corruption were presented in every direction. These were the natural results of continuing an inflated and irredeemable paper money. But the life of the nation was at stake then, and no one who claimed to be loyal stopped to consider, or hesitated to make any sacrifice which the exigency of the country demanded. The use of State bank notes by the Government would have been attended by similar evils without any of the benefits obtained by the use of legal-tender notes. And the evils of State bank notes would have been aggravated by their uncertain and unequal value in different parts of the country, unless the Government guaranteed their security, as it should guaranty the security of any money it sanctions, by using it for payments to public creditors.

Now the question is presented—the exigencies of the war being passed—what shall be done to arrest those evils and bring the country back to its normal condition, in which industry will be satisfied with securing the legitimate rewards of labor, when every one will know what value is represented by money, and when the value of money will not fluctuate and change from day to day, but become intrinsic and permanent, so far as the daily and common transactions of business are concerned.

When armed rebellion was suppressed the military power of the country was promptly put upon a permanent peace footing by disbanding the forces no longer required to maintain the authority of the Government, and arresting at once the immense expenditures of the war. Why could not the same course be pursued in regard to the currency and the financial policy that the war rendered necessary, but which is not adapted to the condition of permanent peace? The object of the Government should be now to give employment to the industry of the country by relieving it from taxation, and by encouraging in every way the development of its resources. It should be understood that the unusual powers which the Treasury Department had exercised to sustain the war will not be continued beyond the exigency that rendered them necessary.

In a condition of peace the revenue of the Government ought not to exceed $300,000,000, or at most $350,000,000; which should be ample provision for interest on the public debt, as well as all current expenses of the Government. There is no longer occasion to borrow money or to authorize new loans to increase the public debt. But the speedy reduction of the debt is a matter of small importance, compared with that of relieving the productive industry of the country from the heavy taxation with which it is now oppressed. I have not been able to join in congratulating the Secretary of the Treasury on the progress that has been made in the reduction of the debt during the past year, as it seems to me our industry could now ill afford it. I can understand why those foreign presses that exhibited toward us unfriendly sentiments during the war should be lavish in compliments of a policy which cannot fail to cripple our own manufacturers and producers. When the debt of the country has been funded, the currency restored to a sound condition, and our industry so far relieved from taxation that it can compete with the labor of other countries, we can then better commence a more rapid reduction of the public debt.

The only way in which the currency of the country can be made equal in value to the money of other countries with which we are connected by commerce, is by gradually reducing the amount of paper money, until what remains in circulation shall become the equivalent of coin, and, at the option of the holder, command an equal amount of coin. Whenever the paper money is at par with coin they will together constitute the money of the country. The constant and increasing supplies of the precious metals now produced in this country would rapidly furnish a sufficient amount for all business and other requirements, if used for currency, instead of being exported as it is now, to pay for importations of the products of foreign manufacture, to compete with and discourage the industry of our own people.

I concur with most of the arguments in the learned speech recently delivered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY;] but he made one statement which I cannot understand, and which did not seem to me consistent with the general tenor of his remarks on the subject of currency. He asserted, if I understood him correctly, that the standard of the value of the currency should be the resources of the country and the integrity of the Government, and not gold and silver. There is no other standard now of the value of a dollar in this country than what the gold speculators in New York determine for it each day, and from hour to hour; but gold is the standard by which the value of the dollar is computed by them. Until the bill authorizing the issue of the legal-tender notes was passed the standard legal value of the dollar was a prescribed quantity of gold or silver. I wish to ask what constitutes a dollar, and how will its value be estimated and ascertained, when the standard has no reference to gold and silver, but only to the resources of the country and the integrity of the Government?

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a reply?

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, in the first place, I wish to remark to the gentleman, who has so kindly indorsed most of the opinions expressed in my recent remarks on financial topics, that he has, I think, slightly misapprehended my position. I did not argue as an abstract proposition that the resources of the country and the integrity of the Government should be the basis of our currency. I was considering the question of our duty under existing conditions, and did but assert that we had in the season of our extremity adopted the resources of the country and the integrity of the Government as its basis, and expanded our currency to meet the exigencies which would have destroyed us had we adhered to a specie basis; but I maintained that, having due reference to the ultimate restoration of our currency to its international character, we should adhere to the basis I indicated and reduce its volume, if we should determine to reduce it at all, so slowly and with such excellent judgment as not to embarrass and impair the internal industry and production of the country.

I do not see how, by adopting gold as the basis of our currency, we can give to a dollar a more fixed and unchanging value than our greenback dollars have. They are the given portion of a fixed amount of currency; and if Congress will, regardless of recommendation or importunity, refuse to indulge in experiments of expansion or contraction, but maintain the existing volume of paper currency, each dollar will continue to be the same proportionate part of the same amount of currency applicable to the business of the country. You may, by law, determine the weight, the diameter, the thickness, and the quality of the metal of a dollar, but you cannot fix its value. The price of wheat is now very high. The last crop was short, and a barrel of flour will buy many dollars. Next year, if by the blessing of the early and the later rains there shall come an abundant crop, a barrel of flour of like quality will not buy half so many dollars. The value of a dollar is equally regulated by the law of supply and demand, whether it be paper or gold; whether it represent one basis or the other.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I thank the gentleman for his explanation. I now resume the line of remark which I was pursuing when I yielded to the gentleman.

In Russia, during the wars with France, under the first Napoleon, paper roubles were issued by authority of the Government representing the silver rouble, worth about eighty cents of our coined money. But those paper roubles gradually depreciated in value to about twenty cents, or one quarter of the silver rouble; and that paper continued to circulate for many years after peace was restored. It was not left, however, to the brokers and speculators to determine its value in the coin of the country. Each year the Government determined and declared its convertible value as compared with coin. For many years the rate was about three and sixty hundredths of paper to one of silver, and at about that rate the paper roubles were gradually withdrawn from circulation.

Whatever we issue as currency, by whatever name we call it and whatever laws are passed in reference to it, the foreign exchange will determine its value by the standard of gold and silver; and it will pass as currency according to that standard of value. When a barrel of flour sells here for fifteen dollars in currency, and gold is worth fifty per cent. premium, ten dollars will be the price here of a barrel of flour in the coined money of the civilized world. In other words, fifteen dollars in currency will be the equivalent of ten dollars in coined money.

I am not in favor of an immediate resumption of specie payments, nor am I ready to name a time when I think specie payments should be resumed; but, in my judgment, that most desirable event should be constantly kept in view, and any legislation calculated to retard it should be strenuously resisted by every one who regards the honor and the true interest of the country. The settled policy of the Government should be to resume specie payments at the earliest period that is possible without jeopardizing the substantial interests of the industry of the country; and all the action of Congress in reference to the currency and to finance should indicate that purpose. Time is necessary to accomplish the resumption of specie payments; but the preparatory steps should commence now. It should be understood by every one that it is the settled policy of Congress to reduce the amount of paper money until its value is restored and becomes equal to coin. I do not believe it necessary to withdraw all the legal-tender notes to accomplish that object, nor do I believe it necessary to contract their amount to such an extent as to derange the business of the country. I am certain specie payments could be sustained with a much larger amount of notes convertible into coin than formerly.

One of the great causes of money panics, which so many seem now to apprehend, has heretofore been the absence of any security for the State bank notes. The failure of a few banks produced a distrust of all banks, and there was then a general endeavor among those who held bank notes to get rid of them by passing them to others or demanding coin for them. The note of a failed bank organized under the general law of any State, with security deposited for its circulation, was no better to one who could not afford to wait for payment of the note until the security was realized. When such notes were received in payment for labor performed and were relied upon to furnish the means for immediate support, if they would not pass at the shop, they must be sold to the broker for whatever he would give—generally one half or less than the note represented when it was received. Such panics have always been the result of want of confidence, which often extended to the most prudent and best managed bank, as well as to those that had been imprudently managed. Few if any banks, however well managed, can long sustain themselves against a panic caused by the sudden loss of public confidence.

The notes of all the national banks are made absolutely as secure as the Government itself; by law they are received at par in all parts of the United States in payment for taxes and all other dues to the Government, except for duties on imports, and for all debts owing by the United States, except interest on the public debt. Whenever a bank fails to redeem its notes in lawful money it forfeits the bonds deposited as security with the Treasurer. The Government, then, so far as the holders of the notes are concerned, assumes the liability of the bank, and the notes are redeemable in lawful money on demand at the Treasury of the United States. This imparts such a degree of security and confidence to the national bank notes, that they circulate as well after as before the failure of the bank.

There is never any general demand for coin among the holders of bank notes so long as there is confidence in the security of the notes. They are generally held in small amounts for immediate use, except by banks and bankers. When the merchant or trader accumulates any considerable amount of them in his business he sends them to his bank to be exchanged for credit on its books, which is known by the technical name of "deposit," and which he can draw out at any time by checks as he requires money.

Nor will there be any general demand for coin among those holding "deposits" in banks so long as the foreign exchanges are not against the country. I say no general demand; there is always more or less specie wanted in comparatively moderate sums for specific purposes. But when a continuation of high prices has encouraged excessive importations from abroad and has discouraged the shipments of our own products to foreign countries, there is an outward flow of specie created by the demand for export to pay the foreign debt which has accumulated. But the merchants and bankers owe that foreign debt, and not the community who hold the circulating notes. The merchants and bankers at such a time will demand their deposits from the banks in specie. If any national bank fails under that demand, the security for its circulating notes is not affected; and their notes will continue to circulate as before until they are paid into the Treasury of the United States or brought there for redemption. The banks in the city of New York, under the exploded State bank system, almost always held specie enough to pay their circulating notes twice over. It was their "deposits," and not their circulation, that troubled them whenever a general demand for specie occurred.

Any general demand for specie is usually at the shipping-ports on the sea-board for export, to meet an unfavorable condition of the foreign exchanges, and is mostly concentrated in the city of New York. For that reason the city of New York should be the common redeeming point for the bank-note circulation. It may be said that there was no foreign demand for specie when the banks suspended specie payment in December, 1861; but that was an exceptional case. The banks then suspended voluntarily, as a matter of expediency, under the apprehension that the effects of the war and the urgent demands for money by the Government would deprive them of their specie.

An unfavorable condition of the foreign exchanges is immediately indicated by an increased demand for specie. Under a prudent system of bank management that demand for specie could generally be met without seriously disturbing the business of the country. At first a moderate contraction of bank loans would be a sufficient check to it. But if the indications are disregarded, and the banks, competing with each other, continue to stimulate the high prices by increasing, instead of contracting their loans, the demand for specie will increase until it becomes so intense that it can neither be met nor controlled. The only relief, then, is a suspension of specie payments.

I have been supposing and calling attention to a condition of specie payments with no other lawful money but coin, in which banks could redeem their liabilities, which has always been the case in this country heretofore when the banks paid specie. We have yet to learn what the effect would be in a condition of specie payments in which the banks are authorized to redeem their liabilities in legal-tender notes, as well as coin, both being lawful money. Experience alone can indicate to us what that condition will require. If I supposed that we could not resume specie payments until all the legal-tender notes were withdrawn from circulation, I should feel that resumption was removed to a distant future. I am by no means certain that the same percentage held by the Treasury in coin of the legal-tender notes in circulation, which the bank law requires to be held in lawful money by banks in the city of New York of their liabilities, namely, twenty-five per cent., might not be sufficient to secure specie payments on the part of the Government as well as the banks. But experience only can teach us what amount of paper money the Government can sustain, and what amount of liability the banks can safely sustain, under the condition of being redeemable on demand in specie. I admit that there is a good deal of speculation in any views that may be presented on this subject, as we have had no experience to guide us; yet it is a road we must travel over, as we progress in settling the future financial policy of this nation. Of one thing we can be certain, which is, that the larger the amount of specie held in reserve to meet the redemption of the paper money, and the larger the amount of specie in the country, the larger will be the amount of paper money that can be sustained in circulation. It must be obvious to every one that one hundred millions of coin would sustain a larger amount of circulating notes than ten millions of coin.

The resumption of specie payments cannot be brought about by a contraction of currency so sudden and extensive as to disturb the industry of the country; it must be by such action on the part of the banks and the Government as will render coin as valuable here as it is in other countries. Until that is the case it is useless to talk of resuming specie payments. This country is now the largest producer in the world of the precious metals; but it may well be questioned whether the country derives any benefit from this unrivaled production so long as we treat it as merchandise, and of no use except to be shipped abroad and its proceeds returned to us in foreign manufactures. The injury this inflicts upon our own manufactures and our own industry more than counterbalances the gains of the miners. The fact that the precious metals are exported shows conclusively that they are more valuable abroad. The Bank of England and the press in Great Britain never consider and represent specie to be a mere product of labor to be exported, and its accumulation as an incumbrance to be got rid of as soon as possible; but it is valued as a basis for the prudent extension of accommodations to the business and industry of the people. The banks of England and of France are able to hold large amounts of specie by pursuing at all times the policy of watching and guarding carefully the "exchanges" with other countries, and by discouraging and counteracting all unusual inducement or tendency to export specie. Under wise laws and prudent management the banks in the city of New York would be practically, to a great extent from their position, the guardians and conservators of the currency of this country.

It is to be hoped that Congress will resist all attempts to remove the limitations and restrictions in the bank law, which were intended as bounds, outside of which the banks could not lawfully move with impunity to endanger the prosperity of the country; and that the amount of their circulation will not be increased, nor the amount of reserve of lawful money be decreased. There is a common misrepresentation in regard to the reserve of lawful money required by the law, in the statement, that no purpose is accomplished by requiring a bank to have the reserve, as the bank is forbidden to use it. The truth is, however, that a bank is expected to use its reserve whenever the occasion calls for it; but when by such use it is reduced below the prescribed proportion to the liabilities of the bank, no new loans can be made by the bank until the proportion is restored, either by reducing the liabilities or increasing the lawful money. It is a minimum reserve of power, to be used when necessary; but whenever reduced below that minimum, to be restored again at the earliest time from the first income and before any other use can be made of the funds of the bank.

It has been urged that an increase of paper money is needed to encourage industry and to lift the business of the country out of the languishing condition into which it is said to have recently fallen. I am told that importations of foreign merchandise have recently been so great that importers are sustaining heavy losses, and look to Congress to relieve them by authorizing the issue of more paper money to raise the prices of their merchandise, and the sale of the surplus gold in the Treasury to furnish greater facilities to pay for their importations. At the same time an increase of the tariff is demanded by the manufacturers to prevent this competition of foreign merchandise, attracted here by the high prices arising from the abundance of money and the inflation of the currency during the past year.

It is difficult to perceive how the increase of paper money at this time could benefit the manufacturers or promote the interest of labor. It would only promote speculation, and, by rendering prices still higher, increase the cost of manufacturing and the expense of living to the workmen. On the other hand, a judicious reduction of currency might cause a gentle and healthy contraction of bank loans sufficient to reduce the cost of materials, so that manufacturers could again afford to start their works, and their workmen could afford to live. The extraordinary prices, mad speculations, and the extravagance and fraud which have prevailed ought to satisfy every one that it is time to establish a sounder policy in the management of the finances, and of the currency.

Any increase of paper money, either in bank notes or legal-tender notes, would not render money cheaper nor remedy the evils which the industry of the country is now laboring under. In the cities of New York and Boston the circulation of the banks when they were State institutions was in each about eight million dollars. Now the circulation of the national banks in the city of New York is over thirty millions, and in Boston over twenty-four millions, and yet the banks often cannot, or do not pay the checks drawn upon them by their depositors; because, as they say, they have no currency to pay with. So much of their reserve of lawful money is in compound-interest Treasury notes, which they really hold for investment, that they decline to pay checks drawn upon them by their depositors, but require the checks to be passed as money until they are settled at the "clearing-house" as an offset for similar checks on other banks received in the business of the day.

This bill discourages the accumulation of bank balances in New York by prohibiting banks from returning as part of their reserve any balances bearing interest, as no bank can afford to pay interest on such balances unless it can loan them. Such balances are generally loaned, therefore, "on call," as it is termed; that is, to speculators, who pledge stocks or gold with a margin, and with the understanding that they may be at once sold on failure to respond promptly to the demand to pay back the loan. The stock and gold speculations in the large cities, and particularly in the city of New York, are generally sustained by such loans; hence the panics and decline in stocks which occur whenever there happens to be any unusual demand for money. Such loans cannot be prohibited, but they should be discouraged. They may be profitable to the banks, but they are fraught with danger to the security of the community. I understand that we are not legislating to increase the profits of the banks, but to increase their safety and usefulness to the public. These balances are accumulated in New York from banks in all parts of the country, not for the redemption of their circulating notes, but for the sake of the interest received on them and their ready command for speculation. It is not proposed that banks shall not pay interest on balances, but that such balances bearing interest shall not be counted by any bank as part of its reserve of lawful money. There is great danger if interest is paid on them that balances will be kept in the weakest banks; the weaker a bank becomes the more tempting will be its offers for such balances. If no interest is paid by any, there will be more care in regard to the character and management of the institutions selected as redeeming agents.

It is unpleasant to many persons to listen to the suggestion that a bank can be weak or fraudulent or imprudent; they seem to consider it irreverent. They think of well-managed banks with which they have been familiar, and feel as many do when they hear of back-sliding in a clergyman, as if it was a reflection on the pure, devoted, high-minded pastors they have known. For the benefit of those who entertain the impression that all banks are immaculate and do not require any restraining influences of law, I would refer to the frauds developed among banks during the past year; for example, in the Merchants' National Bank of Washington. And I will ask the Clerk to read a few short extracts from a recent letter published by Hon. C. V. CULVER, a member of this House, which gives some insight into the actual management of banks.

The Clerk read as follows:

Extracts from letter dated November, 1866, of C. V. CULVER, in relation to the failure of Culver, Penn & Co.:

"In 1861 my office was opened at Franklin, and successively others at Titusville, Oil City, and other points, as occasion demanded, by means of which I became intimately connected as a banker with all the interests of the region. The rapid increase of business made it both desirable and necessary to provide increased facilities for its accommodation, and the private banking offices were converted into corporate banks."

"The entire management of these banks was intrusted to me as fully as had been that of my own private business, and their success was most satisfactory."

"From a single private office at Franklin our combination extended by natural, healthy, and apparently necessary growth, until it embraced twenty banks and banking-houses, including the central office at New York, Culver, Penn & Co. All of these enjoyed the highest degree of real prosperity, having good credit, ample resources, large patronage, and profitable employment for their means."

"The Venango Bank at Franklin and the Petroleum Bank at Titusville were organized under the free banking law of Pennsylvania. Their circulation was secured by the deposit of Government bonds of an equal amount with the auditor general of the State at Harrisburg."

"I bought and deposited the securities, and exchanged them for others, at my own discretion, subject only to the approval of the auditor general."

"You [the president and directors] never troubled yourselves for a moment to know what I was doing or why."

"It was left entirely to me to determine when the circulation should be increased or diminished and the securities deposited therefor withdrawn."

"As this circulation was very large—that of the Venango Bank being $600,000, and that of the Petroleum Bank $900,000—I knew that its sudden withdrawal at the expiration of the time prescribed by Congress would be an inconvenience both to the banks and the community, and as a matter of prudence I deemed it best to commence its withdrawal at an early day, and make it a gradual operation."

"Over $1,300,000 of the notes of these two banks were redeemed from May, 1865, until March, 1866, the time of the suspension of Culver, Penn & Co., and of the banks in consequence."

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. It would seem as if there should be some legislation to regulate and secure the public against mismanagement of banks when twenty of them can be managed by one individual, the president and directors never troubling themselves for a moment to know what was done in the bank nor why anything was done, and all twenty of the banks fail in consequence of the failure of Culver, Penn & Co., of New York. The banks need some regulation and restraint for their own good as well as for the security of the public. Nothing can be more wholesome in its effects upon them than the requirement to redeem their circulation and to discourage the accumulation of their funds in the large cities to be used for speculative purposes. The effect of a prompt and frequent redemption of circulating notes in New York would discourage the use of those notes elsewhere than at home, among the customers of the bank. It would soon be evident to a bank doing a legitimate business that it was for its interest to keep their circulation for use about their own neighborhood, instead of sending it away, and that the redemption of it at distant places should be casual and exceptional.

It has seemed to me that the managers of banks do not generally recognize the difference between the national bank circulation and that of the old State banks. Under State law the banks had practically unlimited power as to the amount of their circulation, but the circulation was comparatively local in its character, and there was a constant effort by each bank to put its circulation out at the greatest distance possible from home, while all the banks were competing to increase their own circulation by gathering up and sending home that of other banks. The experience thus far with the national bank circulation has shown that the notes rarely return to the bank that issues them, but that they become, like the Government legal-tender notes, part of the great mass of the currency of the country. The notes of the most obscure national bank on the most distant frontier has upon it a stamp of nationality which overrides any security given to it by the bank purporting to issue it, and it circulates from one end of the country to the other as readily as a Government legal-tender note. The bank that issued it is bound to redeem it on demand in lawful money; but who wishes to have it redeemed? Other banks do not; they are too glad to use it for currency, and the lawful money in which it would be redeemed would generally have no greater value than the bank note. The effect would have been precisely the same if Government legal-tender notes had been loaned, without interest, to the same amount as the circulating bank notes were furnished. The Treasurer of the United States borrowed in 1863 and since, large amounts of their circulating notes from the national banks before they were put in circulation, and few or none of them have ever been seen by those banks since.

My friend from Maine [Mr. LYNCH] says the people in his State require more currency. But if $9,000,000 was added to-morrow to the circulation of the national banks in Maine, the whole of it would be incorporated at once into the great mass of the currency of the country, and the State of Maine would get only her proportion of the whole mass, as she does now. I admit that it would be a source of profit to those banks in Maine that received it; but it would decrease the pecuniary resources of that State and diminish the amount that those banks could loan to the people there, as they would have to invest more than ten millions of their money in Government bonds, which sell at a premium, to obtain the nine millions of circulating notes which they would add to the general mass of the circulation of the country.

A majority of the Committee on Banking and Currency were opposed to any increase of the circulating notes of the national banks beyond three hundred millions, as now prescribed in the law. But recognizing the justice of the claims in various States where few or no national banks are organized, and of State banks that seek to be organized as national banks, the committee could suggest no fairer or better way of providing for them than to reduce the amount of circulation allotted under the law to the existing national banks. It was proposed, therefore, to obtain the additional amount required, by reducing the present allotment ten per cent. of all the banks, which furnishes a margin of thirty millions for new institutions to be organized under the law. In accordance with the views of a majority of the committee, the bill reported exempts from this reduction all banks having not more than $300,000 of capital, and compensates for it by taking a larger proportion from banks with over $1,000,000 of capital. This leaves in the law what has always seemed to me to be its most objectionable feature in principle and the most dangerous provision in practice, that is, the authority to a national bank having not more than $500,000 capital to invest its whole capital in United States bonds as security for circulating notes; reserving no portion of capital for its business of banking. More than that, the law requires the bank to hold in lawful money fifteen per cent. of the amount of the notes as a reserve to secure their redemption on demand; but having invested all its capital in bonds to secure the notes, the reserve required can only be obtained, directly or indirectly, by borrowing. This seems to me objectionable in principle. In practice it is an invitation to organize banks for the sole object of obtaining the notes to circulate, without doing any business of banking. In other words, it simply provides a mode of obtaining from the Government without interest $90,000 in notes that will circulate as money, and which, to all intents, are as good as the same amount of legal-tender notes, on the deposit of $100,000 in United States bonds as security.

One case has been brought to the knowledge of the committee, of a national bank in which the stockholders were represented to be the partners of a house in the brokerage business with some members of their families. The whole capital of the bank was invested in bonds deposited with the Treasurer of the United States as security for its circulating notes, with an additional amount of bonds in the Treasury as security for public money in the bank as a Government depository. It was found, on an official examination of this bank, that it was located in one of the desks in the brokers' office, and the only entry on its books was about twenty thousand dollars, deposited to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States.

It seems to me that the allotment of circulation by the existing law, and as proposed by this bill, is wrong in principle. The Acting Comptroller of the Currency has addressed to me a letter in which he proposes an amendment, which I shall offer at the proper time, by which the margin of circulating notes for the organization of new banks will be increased to nearly forty million dollars, and sufficient in the opinion of the Comptroller to meet all the requirements for new banks for several years to come. For the information of the House I will ask the Clerk to read the letter to which I have referred.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY,
WASHINGTON, January 7, 1867.

SIR: In order to avoid discriminating specifically in prescribing the amount of circulation a bank may have upon its capital, I would suggest a scale like the following as an amendment to the House bill, commencing in line five hundred and sixty-nine: "And the amount of such circulating notes to be furnished to each association shall not be more in proportion to its paid-up capital than as follows:

"On the first $500,000 of paid-up capital, seventy-five per cent. of such capital; on the second $500,000 of paid-up capital, sixty per cent. of such capital; on the third $500,000 of paid-up capital, fifty per cent. of such capital; on the fourth $500,000 of paid-up capital, forty per cent. of such capital; on the fifth $500,000 of paid-up capital, thirty per cent. of such capital; on the sixth $500,000 of paid-up capital, twenty-five per cent. of such capital; on the fourth and fifth millions of paid-up capital, ten per cent. of such capital, and on all paid-up capital over five millions circulation shall be issued upon the bonds deposited, which the law requires to be with the Treasurer of the United States, not exceeding one third of the paid-up capital."

This schedule would give circulation upon capital as follows:

1st	$500,000 @ 75 per ct.	$375,000
2d	500,000 @ 60 per ct.	300,000	$1,000,000	$675,000
3d	500,000 @ 50 per ct.	250,000	1,500,000	925,000
4th	500,000 @ 40 per ct.	200,000	2,000,000	1,125,000
5th	500,000 @ 30 per ct.	150,000	2,500,000	1,275,000
6th	500,000 @ 25 per ct.	125,000	3,000,000	1,400,000
4th	1,000,000 @ 10 per ct.	100,000	4,000,000	1,500,000
5th	1,000,000 @ 10 per ct.	100,000	5,000,000	1,600,000

One bank of ten millions capital must deposit bonds to the amount of $3,334,000, upon which circulation may be issued to the amount of $3,000,000.

Very respectfully,

H. R. HULBURD,
Deputy and Acting Comptroller.

HON. SAMUEL HOOPER,
Committee on Banks and Currency,
House of Representatives.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. This bill proposes, as I have before stated, to prohibit the use of compound-interest Treasury notes as part of the reserve of lawful money required in the national banks. The object and intention when the issue of those Treasury notes was authorized was that they might circulate as money for only a short period, until the interest accrued upon them had accumulated to such an extent that they would gradually be changed in their character, and instead of circulating as money would become more valuable to hold as a security payable with interest at maturity. The total amount issued by the Treasury Department has been $266,495,440, and of that amount there had been redeemed by the Treasurer and canceled to the 1st of this month $121,594,600, leaving the amount outstanding $144,900,840, none of which are now in circulation as money, but are all held by banks and others as interest-bearing investments. On the 1st of October last the national banks held, according to their reports to the Comptroller of the Currency, $82,415,860 of these compound Treasury notes, which were included as part of their reserve of lawful money. Their whole reserve of lawful money was $205,770,641, exclusive of specie, but including the compound Treasury notes.

It is a mistake to suppose that because the interest accrued on the compound-interest Treasury notes causes them to be held as investment, they therefore constitute no part of the currency. So far as they are held and returned by the national banks as part of their reserve they take the place of so much lawful money, and their use and effect on values is precisely the same as an equal amount of United States legal-tender notes. The banks would substitute for them an equal amount of the legal-tender notes if they could not return the Treasury notes as lawful money. The national bank law requires the reserve of the banks to be in "lawful money of the United States." Coin and the United States legal-tender notes known as "greenbacks" are the only mediums for currency which have been declared by law to be "lawful money of the United States."

Every act authorizing the issue of United States legal-tender notes declared them to be "lawful money and a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, within the United States, except duties on imports and interest" on the portion of the public debt made payable in coin. The act of June 30, 1864, which authorized the issue of the compound-interest Treasury notes, did not make them "lawful money." It said only that—

"Said Treasury notes may be disposed of by the Secretary of the Treasury, on the best terms that can be obtained, for lawful money; and such of them as shall be made payable, principal and interest, at maturity, shall be a legal tender to the same extent as United States notes for their face value, excluding interest, and may be paid to any creditor of the United States at their par value, excluding interest, or to any creditor willing to receive them at par, including interest." * * * "Nor shall any Treasury note bearing interest issued under this act be a legal tender in payment or redemption of any notes issued by any bank, banking association, or banker, calculated or intended to circulate as money."

The fact that these Treasury notes had never been declared "lawful money of the United States," in connection with the preceding provision against their being a legal tender in payments for the redemption of bank notes, was believed to be sufficient to exclude them from being held by the banks as part of their reserves of lawful money. The managers of banks who return them as part of their reserve defend it by saying that they hold the compound notes to redeem their liability for deposits, and not for the redemption of their circulating notes, thereby evading the letter as well as the spirit of the national bank act, which requires the reserve to be in "lawful money of the United States."

Mr. PRICE. With the consent of the gentleman from Massachusetts, I would like to ask him whether a compound-interest note is not a legal tender in the payment of any debt for which any other United States note is a legal tender?

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I suppose the gentleman means at its face value, or for the amount for which it was issued.

Mr. PRICE. I ask the gentleman whether a $100 compound-interest note is not a legal tender in payment of $100, as much so as any other note issued by the Government of the United States, and whether it is not lawful money?

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I leave it for the lawyers to decide whether it is lawful money or not. In the case of the greenbacks the law declared them to be lawful money and a legal tender.

Mr. PRICE. My question is this: if I owed the gentleman $100, payable in lawful money, could I not compel him to receive in payment a compound-interest note for $100?

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. If it had two years' interest accumulated on it I would receive it with pleasure.

Mr. PRICE. Whether it had two days or two years? I ask the gentleman to answer.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. PRICE. I could compel you to receive it?

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir, for its face value; but whether that would make it lawful money is a question I leave to the lawyers. The present Chief Justice when Secretary of the Treasury was of opinion that the compound-interest notes were not "lawful money."

Mr. POMEROY. It is a question of mathematics: things equal to the same thing are equal to one another.

Mr. PRICE. Does the gentleman assert they are lawful money?

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I will, to save time and stop this argument.

Mr. PRICE. I wish the gentleman to go upon the record as saying the compound-interest notes issued by the Government, declared to be lawful money, are not lawful money.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. It would take too much time to explain what constitutes lawful money. What is it in the gentleman's opinion?

Mr. PRICE. Lawful money, sir, is anything that will pass from one person to another in payment of a debt; the law says such are compound-interest notes, and they are therefore lawful money and legal tenders.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. No one can doubt that if it is desirable to withdraw and cancel any notes that have been issued by the Government and used as money, these compound-interest Treasury notes should be first withdrawn and canceled, as it would stop the interest on them, which now accrues at the rate of over seven hundred thousand dollars each month, and it would be equally a contraction of the currency, so far at least as they are held by banks as part of their reserve of lawful money.

The greater part now outstanding of these Treasury notes mature between June and December of the present year, and are payable, principal and interest, at maturity; they must therefore be withdrawn and canceled before the end of this year. If, therefore, it would make too great a contraction in a single year to withdraw these notes, in addition to the $4,000,000 legal-tender notes which, according to the law of the last session, are to be withdrawn in each month, that law might be repealed or its operation be suspended, at least for the present year.

When the compound-interest Treasury notes cease to have the adventitious value which the national banks now impart by holding and returning them as lawful money, the banks will more readily part with them; and those notes would then be redeemed gradually, from time to time, as it suited the convenience of the Treasury, instead of being presented on the day of their maturity in amounts so large that their prompt payment may be at the time exceedingly inconvenient if not impossible. In view of the importance to the Treasury Department of anticipating the demand for the payment of these notes and of redeeming them in the spring and early summer, when there is usually less demand for money, it may be expedient to require payment for any sales of gold from the Treasury to be in whole or in part in compound-notes, including the interest accrued.

The seven-thirty Treasury notes, amounting to $676,856,600, maturing within the next two years, are convertible, at or before their maturity, into the five-twenty six per cent. bonds. It may be said, therefore, that when the compound-interest Treasury notes are provided for, there will be no unfunded liabilities of the Treasury beyond what can be easily paid out of the ordinary revenue, except the United States legal-tender notes. At the regular session of the Fortieth Congress, in December next, we may hope that the report of the Secretary of the Treasury will exhibit a condition in which there will be no demands outstanding for settlement to embarrass the Treasury; and by that time we shall have acquired an experience in relation to the effects of preceding legislation to guide the action of Congress in adopting such measures as may seem requisite to restore the currency to a sounder condition and to secure the future prosperity of the country.

In concluding these remarks, I wish to repeat that I believe much could be done during this year to prepare the way for resuming specie payments, with benefit instead of injury to the true interests of labor and business, if the banks would coöperate, particularly the banks in the city of New York, in the measures that may be requisite for that purpose. The banks can do much, if they have the inclination, to check if not to control and prevent the export of specie; so that the precious metals furnished from our mines might, instead of being exported, accumulate here to hasten and aid resumption, thereby removing the apprehensions of reducing the amount of money in circulation below what an active and healthy condition of business would require. To reduce the loans of banks which encourage large importations and promote speculation, would have more effect in aiding resumption than the contraction of the circulation. One great obstacle to resumption is the profit and the ease in managing banks with an irredeemable currency. I believe that all the amendments of the bank act proposed in this bill would tend to promote more prudent management in the conduct of the banks, and to make it for their true interest to aid at the proper time in restoring a sound condition of currency instead of obstructing it, as their action during the past year, in largely increasing their loans, has indicated. Whenever the resumption of specie payments occurs, it will be brought about in one of two ways: either by the banks coöperating with the Treasury Department in wise and judicious measures to bring it about gradually and without disturbing industry; or failing in this, it will be abruptly forced on the country by a public clamor which, regardless of consequences, will no longer submit to conditions that impoverish the country for the benefit of importers, bankers, and the whole various and motley tribe of speculators.

[During the delivery of the above speech, the hour having expired, on motion of Mr. CONKLING, by unanimous consent, the time of Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts, was extended till he had concluded.]

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN stated that by order of the House the committee would now proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1039, making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending 30th June, 1868.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill for information was dispensed with.

Mr. BLAINE. Would it not be wise to postpone the further consideration of this bill till after final action on the bill which has passed this House transferring the jurisdiction of Indian affairs to the War Department?

Mr. KASSON. Not at all, as that bill does not affect these appropriations.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is this more than a bill making appropriations to carry out treaty stipulations?

Mr. KASSON. That is all.

Mr. MAYNARD. If the bill passed here the other day becomes a law, will these appropriations for agents, &c., be necessary?

Mr. KASSON. It will be left to the discretion of the Secretary of War. Where Army officers are placed instead of civilians, of course they will be paid out of the appropriations for the War Department, and these appropriations will not be called for.

Mr. WINDOM. The gentleman from Iowa, I suppose, has not the slightest expectation that bill will pass the Senate, and of course thinks it better for us to pass these appropriations.

Mr. KASSON. I have confidence in the good sense and patriotism of that body, and I think they will pass it.

Mr. WINDOM. It is from that confidence, I presume, he asks this bill be passed.

Mr. KASSON. I move on page 14, line three hundred and twelve, to strike out "them" and insert "the Red Lake band of Chippewas;" so it will read:

For the fourth of fifteen installments for the purpose of supplying the Red Lake band of Chippewas with gilling twine, cotton matter, calico, linsey, blankets, sheeting, flannels, provisions, farming tools, and for such other useful articles, and for such other useful purposes as may be deemed for their best interests, per third article supplementary treaty of 12th April, 1864, $8,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. I move on page 25, line five hundred and eighty-five, to strike out "seven" and insert "eight;" so it will read:

Kickapoos:

For fourteenth installment of interest, at five per cent., on $100,000, for educational and other beneficial purposes, as per second article treaty May 13, 1854, $5,000.

For fourteenth installment on $200,000, to be paid in 1868, per second article treaty 18th May, 1854, $7,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. I move on page 32, line seven hundred and sixty-three, under heading "Nez Percé Indians," to strike out "seven" and insert "eight;" so it will read:

For second of four installments to enable the Indians to remove and locate upon the reservation, to be expended in plowing lands and fencing lots, as per first clause fourth article treaty of June 9, 1863, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, $40,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. I move on page 40, line nine hundred and sixty-three, to insert the following:

Pottawatomies of Huron:

For permanent annuity in money and otherwise, as per second article of the treaty of November 17, 1807, $400.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRINNELL. I move on page 42, after line one thousand and eight, to insert the following:

Provided, That the band of Sacs and Foxes now in Tama county, Iowa, shall be paid pro rata their portion of annuity so long as they are peaceful and have the assent of the Governor of Iowa to reside in that State.

Mr. Chairman, this proviso I desire to explain, and trust it will appear so manifestly just as to meet with no opposition. The Indians to whom this will apply are a band called Nussquokas, of the Sacs and Foxes, numbering some two hundred, with their lodges near the Iona river, and about twenty miles from my own residence.

On their removal, near twenty years ago, to the reservation west of the Missouri river, a powerful band made war on them, and coming back to their old haunts declared that they would all be killed if they remained. Some ten years since, on their petition and that of their white neighbors to the State Legislature, they being in the senatorial district which I happened to represent, I took up their cause, and without objection a law was passed permitting them to own land and reside in the State. Their just portion of the annuity of the Sacs and Foxes was denied them until last year, when it was granted by Secretary Harlan, and is only given now as a temporary allowance by the present Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

I see no good reason why it should not be permanent. I know of no other band which has not been decimated in numbers and suffered by the vices of the whites. Where they are without money they are objects of our charities. To compel them to go to Kansas is to settle them where they are not wanted, or to provoke the murderous spirit of the warriors from whom they once fled. As to their character, of which I am asked, I have never heard that they were thievish or quarrelsome. They may have no Logan among their "braves;" but with their pro rata of the annuity which I ask schools may be established, more comfort brought to their wigwams, and it is to be hoped such a Christian civilization as will not require the romance of a Jefferson or Seba Smith to find heroes worthy to adorn the sad history of our Indian tribes, which, without a change of policy, will soon be as far beyond our reach as they now seem below our consideration.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the general incidental expenses of the Indian service in Colorado Territory, presents of goods, agricultural implements and other useful articles, and to assist them to locate in permanent abodes, and sustain themselves by the pursuits of civilized life, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $20,000.

Mr. BRADFORD. I move to amend the foregoing paragraph by adding the following proviso:

Provided, That no part of said money shall be disbursed by Alexander Cummings, the present superintendent of Indian affairs for Colorado Territory.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman suggest some one by whom the money shall be expended; if he will I have no objection to giving my consent, so far as I have authority.

Mr. BRADFORD. It must be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior. I find on examination of the accounts of the present superintendent that a great deal of the money has been squandered during the past year.

Mr. KASSON. I have no doubt the money in that instance, as in a good many others, has been very badly expended; and I have endeavored during the last few days to convince the House that such has been the fact generally. But when the gentleman proposes that it shall not be expended under the direction of the present superintendent some other direction must be made, or perhaps he will not only fail in accomplishing his purpose but the money itself may not be expended at all.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, I find myself very much befogged as to matters in Colorado Territory, and I would inquire if there is any information before the House which will justify it in acting thus invidiously in regard to that Territory as is proposed by the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado, [Mr. BRADFORD.] I have seen and heard a good deal of controversy about the affairs of Colorado Territory. I am not a partisan for or against the present Governor of that Territory. I find myself utterly at sea as to accurate information on the subject. The statements of the two sides of the question are irreconcilably in conflict and I would like something like definite information before we adopt the proposed amendment.

Mr. BRADFORD. In reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I will state that I find upon examining the accounts of the superintendent of Indian affairs of Colorado Territory, now on file in the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, that a large portion of the appropriation made last year has been squandered by the superintendent. I find that the sum of $1,800 purports to have been paid to one M. B. Cummings for services as clerk of said superintendency for the year ending December 31, 1866, when it is understood that this M. B. Cummings resides in the city of Philadelphia; and it is a notorious fact that this clerk has not been within the limits of Colorado since May last. I find that the sum of $350 appears to have been paid to one A. Boyd Cummings, as secretary of some Indian council. Who that A. Boyd Cummings is I am not advised. I find that one item in the account of said superintendent, for the quarter ending December 31, 1865, the sum of $2,342, is inserted as money paid to one John Wanless for transporting nineteen thousand six hundred pounds of freight from Denver to the Middle Park, at twelve cents per pound, at an estimated distance of one hundred and sixty miles, when it is a well-known fact that the distance is less than eighty miles. I find many other items in his account equally dishonest; and for that reason I have moved the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the general incidental expenses of the Indian service in Utah Territory, presents of goods, agricultural implements, and other useful articles, and to assist them to locate in permanent abodes, and sustain themselves by the pursuits of civilized life, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $15,000.

Mr. HOOPER, of Utah. I move to amend the foregoing paragraph by striking out the appropriation of $15,000 and inserting $25,000. I will state in explanation of this motion, that the estimate of the Department of the Interior for this appropriation was $25,000, and that the Committee on Appropriations, with a view to economy, I suppose, reduced it to $15,000. In conversing with the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] I explained to him that it was necessary, in order to carry out what was asked for by the superintendent of Indian affairs in the Territory, that we should have $25,000, and that that would fall far short of what we really should have to do for the Indians in Utah. I will state that there is no Territory in the United States which has received less in the way of Indian appropriations than Utah, and no Territory has settled so large a colony with so little expense of money. I understand the gentleman from Iowa has no objection to the amendment.

Mr. KASSON. I will only say that I believe the Indian business of the Territory of Utah is more safely and wisely conducted than that of any other Territory of the Union, and I have been satisfied, as the gentleman has stated, that it was not wise to cut down the estimate.

The question was taken and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BIDWELL. I move to insert between lines fourteen hundred and twenty-two and fourteen hundred and twenty-three the following:

For the purpose of enabling the Secretary of the Interior to purchase the improvements and claims of settlers in Round valley, for an Indian reservation, in the State of California, the following sum or so much thereof as may be necessary, namely, $100,000: Provided, that the Secretary of the Interior shall deem it for the public interest to acquire possession of the whole of the said valley and that the said purchase can be made for a reasonable valuation.

I wish to explain that amendment. It is necessary that the Government shall secure before the lands are all taken up in California a sufficient quantity of land to enable them to maintain the Indians who will be required to be removed to a reservation. The state of things is different in California from what it is in any other State or Territory. We have no tribes there that make treaties; and they are placed upon reservations. It is therefore incumbent upon the Government to reserve lands upon which they can be placed. This valley is peculiarly adapted for that purpose. It is admitted by all to be the best, and perhaps the only place in northern California where the Indians can be properly taken care of. I feel the more anxious about this, because I know the people of that portion of the State are depending upon me to see that this question is properly adjusted; and that the settlers who occupy a portion of this valley should be purchased out, so that it may be used for the purposes of an Indian reservation. I refer only to those settlers who have settled in good faith and have improvements on their lands.

It is not designed to disturb the Indians upon any of the reservations in California, but simply to provide a place where Indians may be taken as soon as it is found necessary to remove them to a reservation.

I believe that the claims of those bona fide settlers in the valley who have improvements and would have a right to be paid can be purchased for about seventy-five or eighty thousand dollars; but it will take a certain amount to ascertain the valuation of their improvements, to make the proofs, &c. It will certainly be necessary to provide some place of this sort, and if delay occurs and years roll on what can now be purchased for $100,000 may cost the Government two or three hundred thousand dollars. All the reports I have seen in reference to this matter agree that the Government ought to have possession of this entire valley and ought to induce the settlers there to give it up for that purpose, for there is no place so suitable for an Indian reservation.

I hope, therefore, that my amendment will be adopted.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. If these lands were not subject to settlement by what right are these settlers there now?

Mr. BIDWELL. I believe that all the public lands of the United States are subject to settlement.

Mr. DEMING. I rise to a point of order. I submit that a proposition to purchase a valley for the settlement of Indians is not in order on a general appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the objection comes too late. The amendment has been offered, and remarks have been made upon it.

Mr. BIDWELL. I will state that a bill reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs has this same object in view. If this amendment be adopted, the second section of that bill may be stricken out, and that will obviate the necessity of having that bill considered in Committee of the Whole. It is for that reason that I ask for the adoption of my amendment.

I have no further remarks to make upon this question, unless some gentleman desires to ask questions in regard to it.

Mr. KASSON. As this amendment is in the nature of new legislation, and involves so much consideration, both as to the propriety of the purchase and the amount required for the purpose if the purchase should be made, I feel entirely unwilling to consent to its being incorporated into this bill. I have outside information that the amount asked for, $100,000, will be altogether inadequate to complete this work if it is once begun. I think such a matter as this should receive the investigation and special report of the Committee on Indian Affairs, or some other committee of this House, before it is incorporated into a bill like this, which our committee has sought to limit to the closest rule of regularity. I hope, therefore, this amendment will not be pressed, or if pressed that it will not be adopted.

Mr. BIDWELL. I will not insist upon the amendment if it is to give rise to very serious objection. But I do say that some such provision as this is absolutely necessary if the Government desires to properly maintain and care for the Indians in California.

Mr. HILL. I would inquire of the gentleman from California [Mr. BIDWELL] whether, if we make this appropriation for the purpose of purchasing this property, there is or can be any legislation to prohibit persons from settling on this land for the purpose of being bought out by the Government?

Mr. BIDWELL. The valley is now full of settlers; it cannot hold any more. In answer to the objections of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] I will say that I am willing to add to my amendment a proviso that the entire purchase shall not cost more than the sum here named; and if it cannot be made for that sum then none of the appropriation shall be used. I am very anxious to secure this legislation in some bill.

Mr. KASSON. That would not do away with my objection, because it relates to the whole subject of making an appropriation for a matter so little understood by the House, and which before it is introduced here should have the special report of some committee.

Mr. BIDWELL. I will withdraw my amendment.

The Clerk resumed reading the bill.

The following clause was read:

Navajo Indians in New Mexico: For subsistence for the Navajo Indians, and for the purchase of sheep, seeds, agricultural implements, and other articles necessary for brooking the ground on the reservation upon the Pecos river, $100,000.

Mr. WINDOM. I move to amend the clause just read by increasing the appropriation to $101,000. I do this for the purpose of making an inquiry of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] I would inquire of him if these are not the same Navajo Indians that have been maintained by the military in New Mexico for the last year or two?

Mr. KASSON. I should suppose the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs [Mr. WINDOM] is better acquainted with that subject than any member of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WINDOM. Then I desire to say that these are the same Indians which the War Department has been feeding for the last two years, or at least the last year. Now the War Department proposes to turn them over to the Interior Department, and this appropriation is in view of that transfer. Under the War Department there have been expended during the last year for these Indians the sum of $1,500,000. It is proposed to turn them over to the Department of the Interior, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] proposes to give that Department the sum of $100,000; or only one fifteenth part as much as the War Department required.

Now I ask the gentleman, considering his vote on the Indian bill the other day, and his justification of the military department upon the subject of Indian affairs, why he proposes only one fifteenth as much for the "stealing" Indian Bureau as the military department required? This $100,000 is for the subsistence of the Indians, for the seeds and agricultural implements for them, and for all other necessary articles, including sheep: while these same Indians cost $1,500,000 last year under the gentleman's improved system for managing Indians.

Mr. KASSON. I propose to answer to-morrow in the House several of the suggestions made the other day by the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM,] one of which he has just repeated. I propose to-morrow to give that gentleman an opportunity to substantiate several of the statements he has heretofore made upon this subject. I could do it in part this afternoon; but the hour is so late, and there is such a necessity for completing this bill to-day, that I prefer to correct his statements to-morrow in the House.

I will say now, however, in answer to his question why we appropriate only $100,000 for the use of the Interior Department for this purpose, that while the War Department has maintained these Indians without any help, which the gentleman knows much better than he states, in view of the prospect of transferring this Indian Bureau to the War Department we believe $100,000 will be ample under the administration of the War Department to sustain both the war and the peace expenditures.

Mr. WINDOM. The gentleman now assumes peculiar honesty, as he did the other day peculiar knowledge of the affairs of the Indian Bureau. He tells the House that this bill has been brought in with a view to turning the Indian Bureau over to the War Department. I leave the question of honesty for the House to determine.

Mr. KASSON. I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, that my friend from Minnesota does not recover more readily from the soreness of his defeat on the bill which we had under consideration the other day. I can assure him there is no soreness anywhere else. I am sorry that the "squaw" still remains on his brain to such an extent as to disturb his equanimity. [Laughter.]

Mr. WINDOM. I suggest that the gentleman has the "squaw on the brain" much worse than I have, as he has referred to the matter three times where I have alluded to it once. I hope that it is altogether on the brain with him. [Laughter.] I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I am sorry that the gentleman from Iowa, with whom I voted the other day, has not answered the question of the gentleman from Minnesota. If it is a fact that, under the management of the War Department, $1,500,000 has been expended on these Indians in New Mexico, the House should know it; and perhaps it might be proper for us to reconsider our action of the other day.

Mr. KASSON. I supposed that members of the House understood very well, as does the gentleman from Minnesota, that the War Department for a long period of time sustained these Indians from its military rations almost entirely, I believe. This resulted from the necessity of the case. There was some discussion between the War Department and the Indian Bureau in reference to the management of those Indians; but not being upon the Committee on Indian Affairs, I cannot enter into the details. I have never heard before that it cost $1,500,000 to sustain those Indians. I think my friend from Minnesota must have been misinformed on that point.

However that fact may be, the appropriation reported here is all that was estimated for. Of course the committee did not increase the amount of the estimates. As to the amount appropriated last year I propose to speak tomorrow. I am disinclined to detain the committee at this late hour.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. KASSON. I move that the committee rise and report the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. GARFIELD reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the President's annual message, had come to no resolution thereon; also that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1039) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending 30th June, 1868, had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments.

MARY J. DEXTER.

On motion of Mr. DELANO, by unanimous consent, the Committee of Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Mary J. Dexter for a pension, and the same was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

RETROCESSION OF ALEXANDRIA.

On motion of Mr. INGERSOLL, by unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. No. 932) to repeal an act entitled "An act to retrocede the county of Alexandria in the District of Columbia to the State of Virginia, and for other purposes," was ordered to be printed.

GLASS AND PORCELAIN COMPANY.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to incorporate the Potomac Glass and Porcelain Company; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is, Will the House agree to the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to the bill (H. R. No. 1039) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending 30th June, 1868?

Mr. KASSON. I call for the previous question.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I hope that will not be sustained.

On seconding the call for the previous question, there were—ayes 22, noes 20; no quorum voting.

Mr. KASSON. I will not insist on a vote this evening upon seconding the call for the previous question. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

Resolved, That as all the legislative power of the national Government is vested in Congress, it is the imperative duty of that body to enact such laws, and provide for the establishment of such governments, in the States lately in rebellion as will secure to every loyal person therein full and complete protection to life, liberty, property, and the enjoyment of equal political rights, to the end that the foundation of such governments may be fixed on principles of eternal justice, which will endure for all time.

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be requested to forward a copy of the above resolution to each of the Senators in Congress and members of the House from the State.

COPYRIGHTS.

Mr. HAYES, by unanimous consent, from the joint Committee on the Library, reported back Senate bill No. 491, amendatory of the several acts respecting copyrights, with an amendment.

The first section of the bill provides that every proprietor of a book, pamphlet, map, chart, musical composition, print, engraving, or photograph, for which a copyright shall have been secured, who shall fail to deliver to the Library of Congress at Washington a printed copy of every such book, pamphlet, map, chart, musical composition, print, engraving, or photograph, within one month after publication thereof, shall, for every such default, be subject to a penalty of twenty-five dollars, to be collected at the suit of the Librarian of Congress, as other penalties of like amount are now collected by law.

The second section provides that every such proprietor may transmit any book, pamphlet, map, chart, musical composition, print, engraving, or photograph, for which he may have secured a copyright, to the Librarian of Congress, by mail free of postage, provided the words "copyright matter" be plainly written or printed on the outside of the package containing the same; and it shall be the duty of the several postmasters and deputy postmasters, when such package shall be delivered to them, or any of them, to see that the same is safely forwarded to its destination by mail, without cost or charge to said proprietor.

The amendment of the committee is as follows:

Insert in second section, between lines eight and nine, after the word "postmasters" the words "to give a receipt for the same if requested, and."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HAYES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MERCANTILE INSURANCE COMPANY, NEW YORK.

Mr. ALLISON, by unanimous consent, moved that Senate bill No. 302, for the relief of the Mercantile Insurance Company of New York be taken from the Speaker's table.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was taken up, read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BOUNDARY BETWEEN OREGON AND IDAHO.

Mr. HENDERSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill directing the Commissioner of the General Land Office to cause the boundary line between the State of Oregon and the Territory of Idaho to be surveyed and suitably marked at the earliest practicable period; which was read a first and second time, and referred, on motion of Mr. BRANDEGEE, to the Committee on the Territories.

Mr. BRANDEGEE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REMOVAL OF WRECK OFF NEW YORK HARBOR.

Mr. RAYMOND, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

REPORT OF J. ROSS BROWNE.

Mr. HIGBY, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was, under the law, referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That ten thousand copies of the report of J. Ross Browne on mineral resources, &c., in addition to those already ordered, be printed for the use of the members of this House; and also that a copy of the rules prepared at the General Land Office to aid in the disposal of the mineral lands under the law for that purpose be added to each copy of said report.

Mr. PRICE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON moved to reconsider the several votes on the foregoing bills and resolutions, on which motions were not made to reconsider; and also moved to lay that motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK called for the regular order of business.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resumed the consideration of House bill No. 1039, making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending 30th June, 1868, reported from the Committee of the Whole last evening with various amendments.

Mr. KASSON. I move the previous question.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I hope the gentleman will allow me to make a motion.

Mr. KASSON. I would like to hear what the motion is before I allow it to be made.

Mr. SCOFIELD. There is a large amount of these appropriations for the maintenance and benefit of the Indians not called for by treaties, and I wish to make a motion to recommit the bill with instructions to strike them all out.

Mr. KASSON. There is a certain amount of appropriations made for purposes not provided for by treaties, but they are customary appropriations in anticipation of treaties. I have only to assure the gentleman that the Committee on Appropriations have endeavored to make the appropriations as small as possible.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I have no doubt the committee are following precedents in making these appropriations. But here are appropriations introduced in the bill, and almost everybody knows that they are wasteful appropriations that never reach the Indians to any considerable extent, and what little does reach them is rather a damage than a benefit to them. I wish, therefore, to instruct the committee not to follow the bad precedents in this case in making these very large and useless expenditures of the public money.

Mr. KASSON. I agree with the gentleman on the facts of mismanagement, but I do not agree that these appropriations are unnecessary or useless. I hope that the evil of the present administration of Indian affairs may be corrected.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I would inquire of the Chair whether, if the previous question is not seconded, my motion will not be in order?

The SPEAKER. It will.

On seconding the previous question, there were—ayes 25, noes 25; no quorum voting.

The Chair ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. KASSON and SCOFIELD.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 53, noes 53.

The SPEAKER. The Chair votes in the affirmative; so the previous question is seconded.

The main question was then ordered.

The question recurred on agreeing to the amendments made by the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to say, touching the point made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the amounts to which he refers are by no means so large as I gathered his impression to be from the statement he made a little while ago. There are amounts not called for by the treaties in the sense of being specially stipulated, but they come under the head of transportation, which cannot be accurately estimated for the reason that the contracts are in futuro. The amounts, therefore, can only be determined when the contracts are made and executed. But the transportation is a necessary result of the treaties. It is necessary to give the goods to the Indians, and so it is with the amounts coming under the head of insurance. That covers all the amounts to which I suppose the gentleman refers except those relating to general and incidental expenses of the Indian service, and those are customary and as indispensable as they are customary, although the amounts are necessarily larger than I wish they were.

The amount appropriated by this bill is, in round numbers, $2,550,000. I stated on a previous occasion that the amounts had grown continuously and very largely with the successive appropriations required for this service. For example, in the year 1829 the appropriations amounted, in round numbers, to $199,000; in 1839 to $60,300. The bureau was transferred in 1849 from the War to the Interior Department, which was then organized. The appropriations for that year were a little short of $1,000,000. In 1861, the year of the beginning of the late war of the rebellion, our Indian appropriations were $1,522,000; in 1863 they were about the same sum. In 1864 the appropriations arose to over two millions; in 1865 to over two and a quarter millions.

Now, in regard to the appropriations for 1861, that is at the last session of the present Congress, I desire to make a particular statement. Preliminary to that statement I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask to have read, a statement made on that subject by the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM,] the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs. The extract is from the Daily Globe:

The Clerk read as follows:

"The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] both oppose this bill and defend the amendment emanating from the Military Committee on the ground of economy. On that point I wish the attention of the House for a few moments. The gentleman from Iowa says that when we look at the fearful increase in the appropriations for Indian affairs it is time that we should pause and ascertain whether some remedy cannot be found for the extravagance of the present system. He says that the expenses have increased within a few years until they now reach nearly four million dollars. The fact, as stated by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in a letter to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, is that the appropriations in 1866, instead of being $1,000,000, were $2,468,050 for the entire Indian service. This included all payments under treaty stipulations and the providing for and taking care of three hundred thousand Indians. Mr. Speaker, this is the alleged extravagance of the Indian department."

Mr. KASSON. Now, sir, the point of fact was made by the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, [Mr. WINDOM,] that the appropriations made in 1866 amounted only to $2,468,050, and he says his statement is based upon a communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to the Committee of Ways and Means. I do not know what communication he refers to, and I should be glad if he would state it to the House.

Mr. WINDOM. I desire to know of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] if he intends I shall be compelled to answer him from time to time as he proceeds, or whether I shall be allowed an opportunity to reply to him after he concludes his argument. If I am expected to get up and be questioned and be limited as to time for my answer, then I prefer not to answer at all. If I am to have time hereafter to answer I will do so.

Mr. KASSON. I will not press the gentleman. He shall have more time from me than he gave me when he closed the debate on the bill transferring the Indian Bureau to the War Department.

Mr. WINDOM. That means simply no time at all, for he asked me for no time at all, for I had none to give him. But the gentleman had already had twenty minutes or a half an hour; I do not remember how much it was. If the gentleman proposes to show to this House that I have made any incorrect statements, I demand of the House the right to correct him. I have the document before me now; I am willing to give him the authority which I quoted on this point, and on every point. But I am not willing to be called up and examined and be required to answer "yes" or "no" without any opportunity to answer fully. If he will give me time to answer fully I will do so.

Upon this point now, I will state that I read from a document dated December 31, 1866. In the excitement of the debate the other day, I misquoted only in this particular: I stated that it was a letter addressed to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. STEVENS.] It was in fact a letter addressed by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to the Secretary of the Interior; being suggested by a letter addressed to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. That is the authority which I read.

Mr. KASSON. I asked the gentleman for his authority in good faith, because he called in question the accuracy of a statement I had made. I had only the desire to do him justice. I do not want the gentleman to take the floor on a single occasion when he does not wish to take it. I want him to take it when he thinks it necessary to correct any statement he may have made on a former occasion.

I state now distinctly that so far from the statement I made being an overstatement, it was an understatement of the amounts appropriated for the Indian service at the last session of this Congress; and I will proceed to prove it. I hold in my hand the regular book of estimates, containing also the appropriations made by law at the last session of the present Congress. The total amount appropriated there in a single bill amounts to $3,780,772 82. In addition to that I have to state that earlier in the session, during the first month of the session, there was diverted by a joint resolution approved December 21, 1865, the sum of $500,000 more from another fund, for the benefit of the Indians in the southern superintendency.

I have also to say that there were some items in the sundry civil expenses bill which amounted to $414,000. There was also an appropriation for replacing lost goods amounting to over thirty-nine thousand dollars. There was also appropriated for the Wyandotte and Winnebago Indians over four thousand dollars. There was also for surveying Indian reservations under the provisions of Indian treaties $50,000. There were also sundry items in the deficiency bill amounting to $35,000; and then for the Indian tribes of the Upper Missouri and Upper Platte over one hundred and twenty-one thousand dollars, making in all $4,945,597.09 appropriated for the Indian service at the last session of Congress, falling short by only a few thousand dollars of $5,000,000.

Hence, when I stated to the House that the amount reached $4,000,000, I was not accurate in the figures, but it was a want of accuracy below the magnitude of the amount. I did not get it large enough. When the gentleman called me to account for the inaccuracy of that statement it was not only due to myself but due to the House that I should ascertain whether or not I was correct in my statement; and these investigations have been made for the purpose of ascertaining the amount as accurately as possible. I believe there are a few items still omitted from the aggregate which I have now submitted to the House.

Mr. WINDOM. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. KASSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WINDOM. I do not rise, Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman very kindly intimated I might, for the purpose of correcting anything I said the other day, for what I then said was correct as I stated it. But I rise for the purpose of giving him my authority. If that authority was not correct, it is not my fault. I stated what it was at the time. And, by the way, the gentleman now states the amount from estimates. Whether the committee on which he acts always report bills for the entire amount estimated I do not know.

Mr. KASSON. I do not state the amount from the estimates, but from the law as passed, which is contained in the book of estimates.

Mr. WINDOM. The authority from which I quoted the other day states:

"Taking the appropriations of 1866 as a general basis for the estimate, the following figures under the three heads last mentioned will be nearly correct:

Fulfillment of treaties.....	$1,960,000
Salaries of superintendents, agents, and clerks.....	101,450
Transportation and insurance.....	127,368
Interpreters, repairs of buildings, &c., and various contingencies.....	91,700
Interest on trust funds.....	187,532
	$2,468,050

This is the aggregate as I stated it the other day. If there is an error it is an error on the part of the Department, not on my part. I quoted my authority at the time.

Mr. KASSON. It will be observed, Mr. Speaker, that I made no charge of willful misstatement against the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs. I never make such a charge against any member of this House. The House will bear me testimony that I am thoroughly exempt from any such indecorum. But I do say that the gentleman, before he called in question my statement, should have examined the authority upon which he made the denial; because if there be one thing in which I take pride in connection with my action in this House it is the fact that never is a statement made by me calculated to mislead the House. It is especially my duty, as well as my pleasure, to manifest this characteristic when I represent the Committee on Appropriations. I have taken pains to exhibit this matter correctly; and I am very glad that I am able to do so, for it at least shows that if the statement of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is now accurately presented to the House, then that bureau itself misstates an important fact having a bearing upon the action already taken by the House, manifesting its distrust in the administration of that bureau.

Now, let me say, touching the present head of the Indian Bureau, Colonel Boggy, that I have no imputation to make upon him from any facts which have come to my knowledge. I have always found that the French creoles, from their acquaintance with the disposition and habits of the Indians, are peculiarly well qualified to manage them successfully. I have no quarrel with any officer of the Interior Department. I wish it understood that every argument I have advanced in this House has been based on my conviction that the public interest requires the change of jurisdiction which I have advocated, a change in the administrative system, in order to secure greater integrity and efficiency, and to get rid of the double-headed system which has brought so many evils on the country.

Why, sir, the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs gave the House to understand that this cry about outrages committed by the Indians and their massacres is all a mere matter of alarm. So far from it, all the papers that I have taken up for a week past from the West, and especially the Chicago papers, which collect all the news from the Territories, are filled with accounts of Indian outrages and massacres, and of the aggregation of various tribes for the purpose of a general war. We can do nothing without troops there. When war comes we must have troops, and then the expenses spoken of by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] occur. It is in this manner that these military expenses have grown up.

The gentleman from Minnesota ridicules the idea of intrusting the affairs of the Indian Bureau to the War Department, and he stated yesterday that the Indians on the Bosque Redondo reservation had cost $1,500,000 for one year. If I misunderstood him I ask him to correct me now.

Mr. WINDOM. The gentleman did not misunderstand me, and if he wants my authority for the statement I will give it to him.

Mr. KASSON. I do not, and I shall now proceed to give what authority I have for stating that the gentleman is greatly in error in that statement. I find in the report made by the joint special committee which went over the plains to examine into Indian affairs this statement:

OFFICE COMMISSARY GENERAL OF SUBSISTENCE,
WASHINGTON CITY, December 28, 1865.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 23d instant, and in reply respectfully inform you that the expense of subsisting the Navajoes and Apaches at Bosque Redondo reservation from March 1, 1864, to October 1, 1865, (eighteen months), was about $1,114,981.70.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
A. E. SHIRAS,

Assistant Commissary General Subsistence.

Hon. J. R. DOOLITTLE, Chairman of Joint Committee to Investigate Indian Affairs, United States Senate.

That shows that for a period of a year and a half, so far from the expenditure being at the rate of $1,500,000 a year, the expenditure for the whole of eighteen months was, in round numbers, only $1,100,000 for the subsistence of the Indians on the Bosque Redondo reservation.

Sir, these Navajoes Indians had for years and years, not the present generation alone, but the generation before them, been making war continually on the whites. In order to stop it the general in command of that military department employed a very good assistant, who knew the habits of these Indians. They occupied fastnesses in the cañons, where they could not be successfully pursued. There are no more inaccessible fastnesses in New Mexico than those which these bands occupied. The general called to his aid Kit Carson, and through his genius and tact, aided by the troops, they have been able to collect from time to time about nine thousand men, women, and children of this tribe and removing them to the Bosque Redondo reservation. They have been collecting them for the past two or three years. They have made these Indians work upon the reservation. They have irrigated it by digging ditches and canals through it. They have got it under cultivation to a considerable extent. All these expenses have been extraordinary; but at last they have got them to a point now where they think they can be safely turned over to the civil management, instead of guarding them by a large number of troops, compelling them to work, and keeping them from committing outrages as they have done hitherto. Consequently this year the appropriation is only for $100,000.

I make this statement not only to correct errors in previous statements made on this floor, but also to answer the question put to me yesterday by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFIELD.]

Now, sir, so much for the Bosque Redondo business; so much for the thousands of Indians taken captive in war with great difficulty and brought to a condition of semi-civilization by the military.

Mr. WINDOM. Will the gentleman yield to me now, or when he gets through?

Mr. KASSON. Now, sir.

Mr. WINDOM. The gentleman quotes a letter of General Shiras, assistant commissary general, making a certain statement of the amount expended to subsist these Indians for eighteen months. The gentleman's error arises from the fact that the commissary department does not estimate anything for transportation. According to the authority which I read the other day, and now hold in my hand, the amount for transportation was greater than the amount for subsistence. I read from the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, dated May 1, 1866:

"The report of General Carleton shows that the cost of subsistence furnished in 1865, after deducting produce raised on the reservation, (valued at $73,246.93,) was $694,226.27. The cost of transporting this I have been unable to ascertain; but as military supplies for New Mexico are purchased in St. Louis and taken by land, the land transportation from Leavenworth alone would amount (allowing two pounds per day to each person subsisted) to about $800,000. Taking into consideration the cost of transportation from St. Louis to Leavenworth, the cost of cartage and other incidental expenses, the cost of subsisting these Indians during the year 1865 could not have been less than $1,500,000. General Eaton estimates that the cost of subsistence during the current fiscal year will be $638,848.73. This, of course, does not include transportation, and is based upon the supposition that the number of Indians to be subsisted will be six thousand. The average number subsisted during the last calendar year, as reported by General Carleton, was seven thousand nine hundred and nine. General Eaton gives no reason for supposing that this number will be reduced to six thousand, but says it is probable."

I will call the gentleman's attention to a discrepancy between himself and one of his military authorities. He estimates the Indians at nine thousand and General Eaton at six thousand. As I have shown by this report it has cost about one million five hundred thousand dollars for their support, including transportation. I submit the question of authority to the House. The gentleman has simply made a statement showing the subsistence, and omitting, as I understand it, transportation, which is the larger sum of the two.

Now, as to one other statement, I am informed by the Superintendent of Indian Affairs of New Mexico, he has an offer from responsible persons in that Territory, to feed those Indians at twenty to twenty-two cents per head, while it has cost the War Department twenty-nine and one half cents per head; and that this could have been done at any time.

Furthermore, I wish to call the gentleman's attention to the peonage at this reservation. I have authority in this document for stating that by order of the commanding officer, these Indians were to be returned to their "masters," and this after the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery had been adopted.

Mr. KASSON. I decline to yield further.

Mr. WINDOM. This is a question of the slavery of these Indians:

Mr. KASSON. That is a side question from the Indian appropriation bill. About that fact I have no information, nor has the committee, and for that reason it should not be sprung upon us at this time.

Mr. WINDOM. I would be glad to give the gentleman information on that point.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman says I differ with my authority in regard to the number of these Indians. Let me say, General Carlton, who commands that department, on page 312 of the same report of the Indian commissioner uses this language:

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF NEW MEXICO, SANTA FE, NEW MEXICO, April 24, 1865.

GENERAL: I returned yesterday from the Bosque Redondo. It will be impossible to organize into bands and systematically direct the labors of the nine thousand Indians we have at that point, unless the lands are properly surveyed. I have written two letters to the Secretary of the Interior on the subject.

There is my authority for referring to nine thousand Indians as being there at the date of this communication, which is April 24, 1865. The military officer, General Carleton, commanding in that district, puts the number at nine thousand.

It will be observed that the gentleman's estimate of $1,700,000 does not rest upon actual figures. So far as transportation is concerned it is merely a statement as to what they suppose the transportation of subsistence would cost, while the fact is, as I learned this morning at the subsistence department, that the habit has been to give them one pound of wheat and one pound of beef or some kind of carcass as their ration, and consequently a large part of these supplies are obtained in the vicinity and without transportation at all; for one advantage of gathering these Indians at Bosque Redondo reservation was to get them in the vicinity of settlements where supplies could be more cheaply obtained. Consequently the large estimate as to the cost of transportation falls to the ground as a mere conjecture of the Indian Bureau, for the purpose of raising an issue against the economy of the War Department.

Mr. WINDOM. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. KASSON. I will.

Mr. WINDOM. As the gentleman has read the statement of General Shiras, the commissary general, giving the cost of subsistence, I desire to ask if that includes transportation.

Mr. KASSON. I suppose every member knows what subsistence means. The statement I have read contains all I know except what I have learned at the subsistence department, as I have just stated.

Mr. WINDOM. Will the gentleman answer my question or not?

Mr. KASSON. I have already stated that I have no other information on the subject.

Mr. WINDOM. I understand the gentleman to say he does not know whether it includes transportation or not. Everybody else knows that it does not.

Mr. KASSON. If there is no other point upon which the gentleman desires information I will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD.]

Mr. WINDOM. Not now. I have failed to obtain much on that point from the gentleman.

Mr. MAYNARD. When this bill was up yesterday I put an inquiry to the gentleman from Iowa which he answered very fully and satisfactorily. On further examination of the bill I find it is composed of two parts: one consists of appropriations to meet the demands of existing treaties; but there is another, embracing a very large portion of this bill, which goes to general intercourse with the Indians, making in the aggregate something more than $1,000,000. Now, sir, by a very decided vote of this House the other day it expressed the opinion that the management of the Indians should be transferred from the Interior Department to the War Department. Should the Senate concur in the action of the House that change will be made, and the act will go into effect at the commencement of the next fiscal year. The existing appropriation for carrying through the affairs of the Indian Bureau for the present year are made. There is no necessity for any further appropriation until the 1st of July next. If in the mean time the law should be changed and the Indian affairs should be placed under the control of the War Department, it would be better to have these appropriations made upon the basis of estimates furnished by the War Department rather than estimates furnished by the Interior Department. The next Congress assembles on the 5th of March, proximo. It will have ample time to pass an Indian appropriation bill before the commencement of the next fiscal year; and I submit to the gentleman and to the House whether we had not better, as a matter of prudence, suspend any action upon this bill during the present session, and see whether that change in the management of the bureau is made. If the proposed change in the law is made we may expect a radical improvement in the management of the affairs, and the next Congress will have full opportunity to provide for the wants of the bureau; whereas if we go on and make the appropriations now under present estimates and the law is changed, the work will all have to be done over again.

Mr. KASSON. As I stated yesterday, this bill is framed in the usual manner and for the usual object of our annual Indian appropriation. If the bill which has passed this House transferring the jurisdiction of the Indian Bureau shall pass the Senate prior to the passage of this bill, then in the Senate its provisions can be modified to meet the emergency if necessary, and when it comes back to the House we can concur in the amendments of the Senate. If not, the only effect, as the matter now stands, would be that the appropriations for compensation of civil officers and employés would lapse, and nothing would be taken out of the Treasury. If the bill which has passed the House transferring the entire jurisdiction over the Indians from the Interior Department to the War Department should become a law, my impression is that no part of this bill would need to be changed. It would only be a lapse of all the appropriations not called for under the new system.

I think it important that we should pass this bill at this time according to custom in order that there may be no failure. There is still some doubt as to how long Congress will remain in session, and it is desirable to have the business disposed of as usual.

I will now pass to one other fact touching the Navajos at Bosque Redondo. I find from a report made by the Commissary General of Subsistence to the Secretary of War, that for six months of the last calendar year, the amount expended by the commissary department, not alone for the subsistence of the Indians on the Bosque Redondo reservation, but for all the Indians at numerous posts and places, was $437,914 49. This was the expenditure, not for the Bosque Redondo reservation alone, but for fifty-two posts and reservations. I mention this as an important fact in order that the House may not be misled by any exaggerated reports from anybody in or out of the Indian Bureau touching these expenditures.

Now, there remains but a single point more in regard to which I will detain the House.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Will the gentleman allow me three minutes before he goes on?

Mr. KASSON. I will now if you wish it.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I have made the effort to recommit this bill, not from any hostility to its general purposes. I know very well that this large appropriation must be made, useless almost as it is and wasted as large portions of it always are. But there are appropriations under the head of "miscellaneous" which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] says he thinks amount to a million.

Mr. KASSON. That is a mistake.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. A portion of these appropriations I think ought to be stricken out; and I wish it to be recommended to the committee for that purpose.

Let me call the gentleman's attention to one or two items. Here is one:

For defraying the expenses of the removal and subsistence of Indians in Oregon and Washington Territory, (not parties to any treaty,) and for pay of necessary employés, $50,000.

There is no treaty in that case. We have made no arrangement to remove these Indians from their present location; there is no contract, and the House is not advised that there is any necessity for it; and yet we are asked to appropriate no less than $50,000.

Here is the next item:

Navajo Indians in New Mexico:

For subsistence for the Navajo Indians, and for the purchase of sheep, seeds, agricultural implements, and other articles necessary for breaking the ground on the reservation upon the Pecos river, $100,000.

Now, of that $100,000 everybody who has had anything to do with these Indian transactions knows that $5,000 will never reach the Indians. And of this million of dollars, if it is a million in all, not five per cent. will ever fall into the hands of the red-skins.

Now, I submit that the vote ordering the main question to be now put should be reconsidered, and the House should have the opportunity of saying whether they will not send this bill back to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to strike out these worthless and corrupting appropriations.

Mr. KASSON. I have already intimated to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOTFIELD,] who knows very well how heartily I sympathize with him in the desire to avoid the mismanagement of this fund, that it is impossible for us to get along without appropriations of this kind. We cannot refuse these appropriations without great danger to the interests of the whites in those Territories, by permitting and leaving the Indians to wander abroad and commit outrages upon the whites from time to time, as they always do under such circumstances. There are always stray bands of twenty or thirty or one hundred or more each, floating and roaming around through the Indian Territory, committing ravages upon the bordering white settlements. And out of this fund the expenses of collecting these Indians together, feeding them in part, providing them with agricultural implements, &c., are paid, in order to remove them from the vicinity of the whites and locate them upon some reservation permanently or temporarily selected for that purpose.

Now the difficulty is that if we refuse these appropriations, and do not allow this to be done, we will soon find ourselves embarked in a war created by the difficulties occurring between the whites and Indians; and then will arise expenses to the extent of hundreds of thousands and perhaps millions of dollars from that war.

Now I should be as glad as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTFIELD] himself to strike out from this bill every such appropriation if I did not know from my acquaintance with Indian affairs that it would expose us to a war from the contact of the neglected Indians with the whites. The gentleman on my right from Oregon [Mr. HENDERSON] no doubt understands the condition of Indian affairs in his State, and I presume he will concur in the statement which I have made. If I am in error he will correct me, as he is familiar with the condition of affairs in his own State.

Mr. HENDERSON. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] is perfectly correct in his statement. The eastern portion of the State of Oregon is entirely overrun by fractions of tribes, who are engaged in robbing, murdering, and generally committing ravages upon the white settlements. They are so small bands that no treaties ever have been or ever will be made with them by the Government, until there is an expenditure of a considerable sum of money to gather them together and locate them. That is essentially necessary at the present time for the welfare both of the Indians and the whites.

Mr. KASSON. I have but one or two other points to make. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] will find upon a careful examination of the bill that he largely over-estimates the amount of these indefinite appropriations. Whatever they are I think I have shown that they are in the main necessary for the preservation of peace between the whites and the Indians.

Now, in regard to the Indian wars which are said to have cost the Government so many million dollars. Two or three years ago there came down upon the Platte route across the plains, the main route of communication with the Pacific, sundry stray bands of hostile Indians, who at once entered upon the work of robbery and murder, commencing, I believe, at Plum creek. They did not come there to avoid the military or to find them, but as they always do to rob and pillage and murder, to sacrifice men, women, and children, leaving them there weltering in their blood, a prey to the wolves and coyotes of the plains. That was the first notice which the whites had of those "harmless people," and of the disposition they entertained toward the whites. They also came down a few years ago into the southern part of the State of Minnesota, and there and in the northern part of the State of Iowa they committed one of those frightful massacres that make the blood of all civilized men run cold. And so they continually act. And when gentlemen rise here and attempt to relieve these Indians from this charge and represent them as a "harmless people," a people that the military are provoking to war in order to spend $30,000,000 of money, then I submit that these gentlemen know nothing at all of the habits of the Indians on the plains.

How was it with the late massacre at Fort Phil. Kearney? I have before me a list of the officers and soldiers killed there. A party was sent out to obtain wood to supply the fort; a small number of the Indians waylaid them, and after they had followed unwisely into one of the gorges they were surrounded by overwhelming numbers of devils incarnate, who brutally murdered every one of them, officers and soldiers. The slaughtered men represented some ten States. I find upon this list names from Massachusetts, New York, Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania—several from the city of Philadelphia—and from other States, who were murdered without any provocation whatever by these Indians.

Now, if it be possible by accurate statements of the character of these Indians in warfare, I desire to correct this innocent idea that they are a harmless people, and that simply by sending a missionary or a civil messenger to them they would bow their heads in obedience to the doctrines of Christianity, and accept the laws of war as known and practiced among civilized nations.

The mass of them, both the chiefs and the members of the tribes, are men who know no law but the law of violence. There are a few chiefs who are friendly to the whites. One of them has recently come into a fort and has notified General Sherman, who knows him well, that there is now danger of a universal and sweeping war; that we are upon the very threshold of such a war. The newspapers contain statements that some twelve thousand Indians have already taken the war-path; and this chief says that, so soon as the season opens, they will come down upon all the routes used by the whites across the country.

I hold, sir, that there can be no security against these depredations and wars except by establishing a military police over the whole Indian country; and when an Indian tribe observes its treaty let its stipulations be fulfilled; when it violates the treaty, abolish that treaty. Let it be distinctly understood that so long as there is peace between them and the whites so long and no longer shall they receive the allowances which may be voted to them by Congress.

Sir, the whole western newspaper press has been for a long period of time insisting upon the necessity of a radical and vital change in our system of dealings with the Indians. Every mail brings me papers urging such a change. I know the feeling of western men, and I know that they put no confidence whatever in the administrative system of the Indian Bureau. Why, sir, a year ago last fall, when I was on the plains, one of the military columns—so very expensive as they are stated to be and are—was in pursuit of the Indians, when the civil emissaries of the Government came out there and stopped the column just before it had reached the point where it was to strike the blow. They said, "Fight these Indians no more: let us have a talk with them;" and Colonel Leavenworth, an accomplished man, was sent along with others to make a treaty with them. In the same way treaties were made elsewhere; and the effect of those treaties was simply, as General Pope predicted at the time, that the Indians obtained new supplies with which to make a new war upon the whites; and they are now nearly all on the war-path. The Arapahoes, the Apaches, the Cheyennes, and several other bands of Sioux are threatening to destroy all the white settlements, and to render unsafe for travel all our routes across the plains.

As a gentleman near me reminds me, powder was recently actually furnished to these Indians by agents or traders. The Indian chief to whom I have referred declared that not only the chiefs but members of the tribes had been supplied with from one to three revolvers each, and were perfectly ready to make war. The Indian Bureau has allowed powder to be served out to them; and they have obtained arms from the traders, either with or without the consent of the Indian Bureau. Provided with all these instrumentalities, the Indians are sweeping down in thousands for the destruction of the whites, both civilians and troops.

Mr. THAYER. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. KASSON. I will do so.

Mr. THAYER. It seems to me that the gentleman, in his eloquent peroration, has made the best possible argument against his bill. If Indian wars and Indian atrocities are to be prevented by squandering millions of money upon Indian agents, I desire to ask why this practice, which has so long obtained, has not prevented Indian wars and Indian outrages heretofore? If there is anything in the gentleman's argument, why has not this practice heretofore produced the results which he contends should logically be its consequences?

Now, sir, so far as regards such appropriations in this bill as have in view the carrying out of existing treaties, those appropriations must be made. We must abide by the treaties we have made. But so far as regards the immense sums proposed to be appropriated for other purposes—immense sums which are thrown to these savages to prevent the atrocities which the gentleman has so eloquently described—the past experience of the Government shows that this method of treatment is unavailing to prevent the outrages which are annually perpetrated by these savages. I say, therefore, that the proposition of my colleague [Mr. SCOFIELD] has much in it deserving the attentive consideration of this House, and that those portions of the bill to which I have adverted, having in view the appropriation of immense sums not required for the fulfillment of existing treaties, should, in my judgment, be stricken from the bill. I hope the House will yet give my colleague an opportunity to make the motion he has indicated.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to reserve time to answer questions put to me.

The SPEAKER. Except by unanimous consent, when the gentleman's hour expires, he cannot be allowed to proceed.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to answer the suggestion made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. There are no such immense sums for general purposes appropriated by this bill as he suggests. Nearly the entire bill is to carry out existing treaty stipulations. We could not discriminate between those treaties broken by the Indians and those that are not. We have added at the conclusion of the bill the following, which guards that subject for the first time:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That no moneys or annuities stipulated by any treaty with an Indian tribe for which appropriations are herein made, or for which appropriations shall hereafter be made, shall be expended for, or paid, or delivered to any tribe which, since the next preceding payment under such treaty, shall have engaged in hostilities against the United States, or against its citizens peacefully and lawfully sojourning or traveling within its jurisdiction at the time of such hostilities; nor in such case shall such stipulated payments or deliveries be resumed until new appropriations shall have been made therefor by Congress; and it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to report to Congress, at each session, any case of hostilities, by any tribe with which the United States has treaty stipulations, which shall have occurred since his next preceding report.

Secondly, we must have some appropriations which do not touch the tribes now making war, nor those with whom we have treaties; but only to enable us to carry out existing arrangements for Indians collected, or to be collected, under civil control.

Thirdly. The military department must have some funds, so that when they capture Indians they may, as they will have to subsist them upon reservations or elsewhere, just as they have been subsisted on the reservation at Bosque Redondo under restraint. These Indians have to be subsisted on Army rations or from special funds or they would be starved. That is all I have to say on that.

Mr. BROMWELL. I would ask the gentleman from Iowa whether if this provides for withholding treaty money from tribes which have broken treaties, if that will not lead to the committing of savage atrocities by them as well as withholding appropriations not provided for by treaty, of which he has spoken?

Mr. KASSON. It of course provides for fulfilling our treaty stipulations.

Mr. WINDOM. The gentleman says I have referred to these as a harmless people. I believe I have never made any such reference. I believe there is no member of this House who better knows how far they are from harmless. The terrible experience of my own constituents proves them much more nearly allied to demons than to angels.

I am also charged by the gentleman with championing the present Indian system. That is not my position. I introduced a bill intended to correct the evils complained of in that system, and appealed to the House to pass it to prevent the evils shown to exist also under military superintendency.

I referred to the military not for the purpose of casting any reflection, but merely to show we are not more secure under them than under civil management.

So far as these large appropriations are concerned, I desire to say that if the Indians shall be transferred to the War Department you will appropriate twenty, thirty, or a hundred millions for the military service and you will never hear of it again. Three or four millions per annum will be squandered in the Indian service and no one will ever think of asking any questions, nor of looking into the vast maelstrom of military expenditure; just as no one would ever have known of the reckless extravagance in New Mexico if this investigation had not taken place. For the fact is that the appropriations for the military service are so enormous that a few millions are easily stolen without attracting attention. The Indian service will afford a rich field for military speculations if the transfer shall be made.

Mr. KASSON. If the bill passed the other day becomes a law, and the jurisdiction of Indian affairs be transferred to the War Department, we will still have an Indian appropriation bill and examination into all Indian matters by the able committee at the head of which is the gentleman from Minnesota.

The great evil now is that we have a double-headed system in which one branch of the service charges the responsibility on the other. I understand that the instance in reference to which we hear so much and touching the origin of which the dispute has never been settled, the killing of the Cheyennes was by volunteer soldiers with volunteer officers, and not an officer or soldier of the regular Army among them. I ask for the question.

Mr. THAYER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 45, noes 42; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. KASSON and Mr. THAYER.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes seventy-one, noes not counted.

So the vote ordering the pending question was reconsidered.

The question recurred, Shall the main question be now put? and being put it was disagreed to.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations, with instructions to strike out all appropriations not required by treaty stipulations, or not necessary to pay Indian agents, &c., under the law.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope the gentleman will modify his motion so that the bill shall be recommitted with instructions to report back the bill with sums necessary to carry on existing treaty stipulations, until it is decided whether the bill passed the other day shall become a law.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I agree to that.

Mr. KASSON. There must be some appropriations for Indians on reservations like those at Bosque Redondo, which cannot sustain themselves and must be saved from starvation by rations doled out to them.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I do not well see how I can so frame it as to include what the gentleman suggests.

Mr. KASSON. If the gentleman will make his motion with instructions to report a bill excluding all indefinite appropriations not necessary to carry out treaty stipulations or to maintain Indians now in the custody of the United States it will come, perhaps, as near to what he desires as is practicable.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I am disposed to accept that modification. But I do not know that it will cover all these appropriations to which I object.

Mr. KASSON. The objection made by the gentleman shows that any modification will fail of accomplishing entirely his purpose. This will cover much more than it is safe to strike out. It will strike out a portion of the expenses under the head of general incidental expenses, but it will enable us to take care of those Indians over whom we have control, those just gathered on the reservations.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I will accept the modification omitting the word "indefinite."

Mr. KASSON. I will leave the gentleman to fix it for himself; but I confess that I doubt whether he can fix it in a practicable way.

The motion of Mr. SCOTFIELD, as modified, was agreed to; and the bill was accordingly recommitted.

Mr. SCOTFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution for reference to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That the publishers of the Congressional Globe shall be, and are, directed and required to so arrange the Index to the volume of the Congressional Globe heretofore to be published that it shall give the number and title of every bill and resolution introduced into Congress, with a reference to the pages showing the proceedings thereon. Also, that said publishers be, and are, directed to insert in one of the volumes of the Globe for each session a plan of the Senate and House of Representatives, showing the seats occupied by the members respectively, and a list of the members and officers of the Senate and House of Representatives, with the post office address and occupation of such of them as may furnish the same to said publishers.

Mr. SPALDING objected.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit a report from the Secretary of State, in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives of yesterday, making inquiry as to the States which have ratified the amendment to the Constitution proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, February 5, 1866.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

WASHINGTON, February 5, 1867.

The Secretary of State having received a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 4th of February, 1867, directing him to report to that House what States now represented in Congress have ratified the amendment to the Constitution proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress, has the honor to report to the President that authentic evidence of such ratification has been received at this Department from the following-named States: Connecticut, Tennessee, New Jersey, Oregon, Vermont, West Virginia, Kansas, and Missouri.

A printed copy of a joint resolution ratifying the said amendment, bearing the printed names of the Speaker of the House of Representatives and President of the Senate of the State of New Hampshire, followed by the words "approved July 7, 1866," the printed name of the Governor of said State, and "a true copy, attested Walter Harriman, Secretary of State," has also been received at this Department. Respectfully submitted.

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

To the President.

On motion of Mr. BINGHAM, the communication was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

PENTWATER AND PERE MARQUETTE HARBORS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the House of February 1, 1867, transmitting maps of the harbors of Pentwater and Pere Marquette, supplemental to his report of the 2d instant; which was ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE MISSISSIPPI.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in answer to resolution of the House of January 25, 1867, the report of the chief engineer, accompanying General Wilson's report on the survey and improvement of the Mississippi river; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

SOUTHERN SUPERINTENDENCY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, communicating the accounts of the superintendent and agents of the southern superintendency, in compliance with the act of March 5, 1865; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER then proceeded, as the regular order of business, to call the committees for reports, resuming the call where it was last suspended with the Committee on Military Affairs.

CLAIMS FOR HORSES.

On motion of Mr. SCHENCK, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the letter from the Secretary of War in relation to claims for horses, including the letter from the acting quartermaster general on the same subject, no further legislation being needed on the subject; and the same was laid on the table.

ARMY SUPPLIES.

On motion of Mr. SCHENCK, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of a communication from the quartermaster general in relation to a plan for settling the claims against the Government for supplies taken by the Army; and the same was referred to the Committee of Claims.

THE LATE WAR.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am instructed by the committee to report back a resolution providing for the publication of a work illustrative of the late war, together with the correspondence of the War Department in relation to the same; and I am instructed by the committee to say that they find such a work would be attended with enormous expense. I move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution, and that it be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

MILITARY PEACE ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. SCHENCK also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, bill of the House No. 895, to amend an act entitled "An act to increase and fix the military peace establishment of the United States," approved July 28, 1866; and the same was laid on the table.

ARMY RATIONS.

Mr. SCHENCK also, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, bill of the House No. 898, to place all officers of the Army on the same footing therein as to the allowance of extra rations as officers of the volunteer service; which was laid on the table.

VOLUNTEER SERVICE.

Mr. SCHENCK also, from the same committee, reported a bill declaring and fixing the rights of volunteers as a part of the Army; which was read a first and second time.

The bill provides that in computing the length of service of any officer of the Army, in order to determine what allowance and payment of additional and longevity rations he is entitled to, and also in fixing the relative rank to be given to an officer, there shall be taken into the account and credited to such officer whatever time he may have actually served, whether continuously or at different times, as a commissioned officer of the United States, either in the regular Army or since 19th April, 1861, in the volunteer service.

The bill further provides that in all matters relating to pay, allowances, rank, duties, privileges, and rights of officers and soldiers of the Army of the United States, the same rules and regulations shall apply, without distinction, for such time as they may be or have been in the service, alike to those who belong permanently to that service and to those who as volunteers have been in the service.

The bill also provides that nothing therein contained shall be construed as affecting or in any way relating to the militia of the several States when called into the service of the United States.

Mr. SCHENCK. I propose in a very few words to explain to the House the object of this bill: and then, unless there are members who desire to make inquiries of me, I will call the previous question.

There prevails in what is called the regular Army an idea that volunteers are not a part of the Army of the United States; the main object of this bill is to correct that idea. In all respects volunteers have been called throughout the late war by those who represented the regular Army the "militia." Now volunteers are not militia; the militia are State organizations; and when they are called into the service of the United States they go bodily into that service with all their State organizations complete. The State militia, by regiments, by brigades, and by divisions, are simply called into the service of the United States, and they cooperate with the Army of the United States. Volunteer soldiers, however, although obtained for limited periods of time, are yet obtained under the laws of the United States. All drafts, all enlistments, all that relates to volunteers, all that is done with them when they are once raised and are constituted a part of the military forces of the Government, is in relation to them as soldiers of the United States.

There is but one exception, indeed, from which any one might infer anything else. During the recent war the commissions of all regimental and company officers of volunteers were granted by the Governors of the several States from which they came; yet those Governors of States in doing this only acted as the agents of the Government of the United States.

The second section of this bill provides that in all things relating to their privileges, rights, &c., the rules and regulations of the service shall apply without distinction for such time as they may be or have been in the service, alike to those who belong permanently to that service and to those who, as volunteers, may be or have been mustered into the military service under the laws of the United States for a limited period. But nothing in this act is to be construed as relating in any manner to the militia of the several States when called into the service of the United States. Then there is a specific provision contained in the other section of the bill: that for the purpose of computing the time for which is allowed the longevity ration, or the additional ration for every five years of service, when officers are appointed in what is called the regular Army, the permanent Army of the country, there shall be computed whatever time they may have served under a volunteer commission. That is, when the longevity ration is granted to an officer now in the Army of the United States, his length of service in the Army shall not be computed simply from the time he was appointed in the regular Army, but he shall have allowances made to him also for that period of time which he passed in the volunteer service.

Again, it is provided that in fixing the relative rank of officers of the same grade and of the same date of appointment or commission there shall be taken into account the time they served in the volunteer service. This provision is made necessary from this fact: that in reorganizing the Army and in extending it a great number of original vacancies have been filled. In filling those vacancies it has been provided that a certain proportion of the appointments shall be taken from those who have served in the volunteers and a certain other proportion taken from the regular Army. Now it turns out in practice that this course is pursued; a number of officers are appointed or commissioned as of the same date, and it becomes necessary to determine which of them shall have relative rank above the other. The present regulation requires that in order to fix their relative rank an account shall be taken of any previous service in the Army before they were thus appointed. If a man has been in the regular Army for a year, or for six months, or for three months, or for even one month, he is credited with that year or six months or three months or one month of service, because they say he has been for that time in the Army and must be put in relative rank above others of the same grade who have not served so long in the regular Army.

Mr. SPALDING. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SCHENCK. I will yield for a question.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to make but a single remark. I have in my mind the case of a young man who served four years in the volunteers, and afterward served a year in the regular Army. He was an orderly sergeant, and his officers recommended him for a commission, but he could not obtain it because he had not served two years in the regular Army.

Mr. SCHENCK. I was just going to state such a case by way of illustration. Under the present system a man may have been in the volunteer service and may have fought through the whole war against the rebels, yet in the regular Army he is put below a captain who has held the position for only a month, upon the ground that he has never been in the Army at all. By this bill we propose that time spent in the volunteer service shall be counted as time served in the Army. This is the whole of the bill. With this explanation, unless some gentleman desires further information, I will call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LONGEVITY RATION.

Mr. SCHENCK. The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred a petition of certain officers of the United States Army praying that officers on the retired list may be allowed longevity rations, and a petition of Brevet Major General L. Thomas, on the same subject, have directed me to report them back, accompanied by a bill, of which we recommend the passage, entitled "An act to extend to general officers and officers on the retired list the benefit of the additional ration for every five years' service."

The bill was read a first and second time. It provides that section fifteen of the act to increase the present military establishment of the United States, and for other purposes, approved July 5, 1838, be amended so that general officers shall not hereafter be excluded from receiving the additional ration for every five years' service. It is further provided that officers on the retired list of the Army shall have the same allowance of additional rations for every five years' service as officers in active service.

Mr. SCHENCK. I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ASYLUM FOR DISABLED SOLDIERS.

Mr. SCHENCK also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill to amend the act establishing the National Asylum for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers; which was read a first and second time.

The bill provides that, the act named in the title be amended so that in case any manager selected by the Senate and House of Representatives who may have been or may be afterward, and during his term of service as manager, elected a member of Congress, he shall not for that reason be ineligible to hold the place of a member of the board of managers, but may continue to serve on the board to the end of his term the same as if he were not a member of Congress.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GRANT OF PROPERTY TO OHIO.

Mr. SCHENCK also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a joint resolution granting certain public property to the State of Ohio; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, provides that the building, sheds, furniture, lumber, and other property now at Camp Chase, near Columbus, Ohio, shall be donated to that State, to be used in the erection of the State Asylum for the Idiotic.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GRANT OF LAND FOR BRIDGE PURPOSES.

Mr. SCHENCK, from the same committee, also reported a joint resolution for the reduction of the military reservation of Fort Riley, and granting land for bridge purposes to the State of Kansas; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, declares the southwestern boundary of the military reservation of Fort Riley, in the State of Kansas, to be hereafter the channel of the Republican river from its mouth to where said river intersects the present western line of said reservation; and grants the land released from said reservation, lying between Smoky Hill and the Republican river, to the State of Kansas, to aid in the construction of a bridge across the Republican river on the public highway leading from the present reservation, and on the express condition this grant shall be accepted by the State with the guarantee, by act of the Legislature, that said bridge shall be kept up and in good condition, and be free to the United States for all transit purposes without toll.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL BOUNTY.

Mr. SCHENCK. The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred petitions of soldiers, &c., asking for additional bounty, have directed me to report it back, and move that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be laid on the table, as the matter is already provided for in the general bill reported by the committee.

The motion was agreed to.

J. H. HAMLIN.

Mr. SCHENCK, from the same committee, reported a joint resolution to pay Lieutenant John H. Hamlin for military services; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution directs the payment to Lieutenant John H. Hamlin, of Michigan, late first lieutenant of the Michigan cavalry, full pay and allowances of second lieutenant of cavalry from 8th of January, 1863, to 28th of March, 1864, when he was mustered in as first lieutenant.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. Moore, one of his Secretaries.

COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. SCHENCK, from the same committee, also reported back House joint resolution No. 226, extending the provisions of section two of an act entitled "An act to extend the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, and to provide for the payment of certain demands for quartermasters' stores and subsistence supplies furnished to the Army of the United States," approved July 4, 1864, with an amendment.

The bill, which was read, provides that the provisions of section two of the above-entitled act be, and they are hereby, extended to cover all cases of property of any kind taken by order of Major General Lewis Wallace, for the use of forces under his command during the Morgan raid through the States of Indiana and Ohio, in July, 1863, whether such property was taken or receipted for by officers of the United States Army or any other person belonging to said forces.

The amendment reported by the committee was to strike out all after the word "cases" in line four, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Where quartermasters' stores were actually furnished to the forces under the command of Major General Lewis Wallace, duly receipted for by persons acting under his authority during the Morgan raid through the States of Indiana and Ohio, in the summer of 1863, and for the purpose of giving such receipts for property so applied, the said persons shall be held to be proper officers of the Government.

The amendment was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. SCHENCK, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the claim of Martha Trenis, and the same was referred to the Committee of Claims.

VOLUNTEER OFFICERS.

Mr. SCHENCK, from the same committee, reported back a joint resolution for the relief of certain officers of volunteers, recommending its passage.

The joint resolution, which was read, provides that in every case in which a commissioned officer or enlisted man was detached from his regiment, in pursuance of orders from the War Department, and directed to report to Brigadier General Daniel Ullman in New York city, with a view of being mustered as commissioned officer in the brigade which General Ullman was authorized by the War Department to raise, and who reported in New York without neglect, and under order of his superior officer entered on duty, and was afterward mustered, but by reason of capture by the enemy or other cause beyond his control, without fault or neglect of his own, was not mustered within a period of not less than thirty days, the Department shall allow to him full pay and emoluments of the rank in which he served from the date at which he received the order of the War Department, deducting therefrom all pay actually received for such period; and in case of the death of any such officer or enlisted man prior to or after muster or after honorable discharge, his heirs or legal representatives shall be entitled to the pay aforesaid.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Thornbrough, and Jabez Gifford, asking for back pay and bounty; and the petitions were laid on the table, with leave to the petitioners to withdraw their papers at their own request.

Also adversely on the petitions of George M. Willing and of John Fales; which were laid on the table.

Also adversely on House bill No. 931, to grant relief to honorably discharged soldiers who have lost their discharges; which was laid on the table, the case being provided for in a general bill already passed.

Also adversely on House joint resolution No. 255, to provide longevity rations; which was laid on the table, the case having been provided for in a bill already passed.

OLIVER LUMPHREY.

Mr. SCHENCK also, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Oliver Lumphrey; which was read a first and second time.

The bill directs the Paymaster General to pay to Oliver Lumphrey, late a lieutenant in the first New York cavalry, a sum equal to the pay of a first lieutenant in the United States cavalry, from 1st March, 1865, to 1st June, 1865, deducting therefrom any amount which he may have received as a non-commissioned officer or private during the same time.

PAYMENT FOR HORSES.

Mr. SITGREAVES, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the payment of horses and other property lost in the military service of the United States," approved March 3, 1849; which was read a first and second time.

The bill provides that the act to which it is a supplement shall, from the commencement of the late rebellion, extend to and embrace the cases of all horses lost, killed, or disabled, by drowning or otherwise; provided it shall appear that such loss occurred without any fault or negligence on the part of the owner, and while he was in the line of duty as an officer, non-commissioned officer, or soldier.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I suggest to the gentleman from New Jersey whether this bill would not cover the case of horses lost during transportation by water? Under the present law, where a horse is lost for any reason during transportation, except the unavoidable dangers of the sea, the ruling of the Department has been that it cannot be paid for. For example, we had before our committee a case of this nature: a horse was being transported on board a steamboat on the Mississippi river, and no railing had been put up on the side of the boat. During the night an accident occurred, and the horses and mules on board became frightened, and one horse was kicked overboard. The committee decided that the law did not cover that case.

Mr. SITGREAVES. This bill provides for all cases of lost horses.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SITGREAVES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SETTLEMENT OF OFFICERS' ACCOUNTS.

Mr. MARSTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, a joint resolution to facilitate the settlement of officers' accounts; and the same was laid on the table.

BOUNTY ON PENNSYLVANIA VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. MARSTON also, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, bill of the House No. 975, for the payment of bounty to the soldiers of the one hundred and eighty-sixth Pennsylvania volunteers; and the same was laid on the table.

TENNESSEE INDEPENDENT SCOUTS.

Mr. MARSTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, also reported a bill for the relief of Captain Beaty's company of independent scouts; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill, with its preamble, to be engrossed and read a third time.

The preamble states that David Beaty, of Fentress county, Tennessee, on the 25th of January, 1862, organized a company of independent scouts, numbering one hundred and two men, including himself as captain, and his first and second lieutenants; that the company was on continuous duty, engaged in the work of suppressing the rebellion, from the date of its organization until the 1st day of June, 1865, serving under the orders of the commander of the Union Army in Tennessee; that said company was never mustered into the service of the United States by any properly authorized mustering officer, and neither officers nor privates of said company have ever received from the Government of the United States any compensation for their services.

The bill provides that the organization set forth in the foregoing preamble shall be recognized as a part of the military force of the United States, engaged in suppressing the recent rebellion, and the members thereof, on making proof of actual service, are declared to be entitled to the same pay, bounty, pensions, and other allowances as though they had been regularly mustered into the service of the United States.

Mr. LE BLOND. I would like to hear from some member of the Committee on Military Affairs whether this was a regularly organized company under the laws of the United States, or whether it was merely an organized guerrilla party?

Mr. MARSTON. It was not an organized company under the laws of the United States; it was never regularly mustered into the service. But Captain Beaty raised this company in January, 1862, and continued in the service of the United States, acting under the authority of the military commander of Tennessee all the time until June, 1865.

Mr. LE BLOND. Did he act in the military organization and under the proper officers? If so, I have no objection to make.

Mr. MARSTON. I have here the letters of General Thomas and General Burnside, under whom they acted, recommending this bill.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire to suggest to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. MARSTON] to amend his bill so as to require the proof to be submitted in such form as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War.

Mr. MARSTON. That will be so at all events, because no one else can prescribe what testimony shall be furnished.

The preamble and bill were then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MARSTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill and preamble were passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RETIRED ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. MARSTON. The House referred to the Committee on Military Affairs the petition of some thirty or forty persons of Philadelphia, asking the repeal of the law which retires officers of the Army at a certain age, and that no retirement be made without the report of a board of examination. The committee have had that subject under consideration, and have instructed me to report a bill to repeal the twelfth section of the act approved July 17, 1862, entitled "An act to define the pay and emoluments of certain officers of the Army, and for other purposes."

The bill was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

It provides that the twelfth section of the act approved July 17, 1862, entitled "An act to define the pay and emoluments of certain officers of the Army, and for other purposes," be and the same is hereby repealed; and that the President shall be authorized to assign any officer retired under the act of August 3, 1861, to any appropriate duty, and the officer thus assigned shall receive the full pay and emoluments of his grade while so assigned and employed.

Mr. MARSTON. I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MARSTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

D. RANDOLPH MARTIN, ASSIGNEE.

Mr. MARSTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, also reported a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to adjust and settle the claims of D. Randolph Martin, assignee of the Washington, Alexandria, and Georgetown Railroad Company; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

The joint resolution, which was read at length, proposes to authorize the Secretary of War to adjust and settle the claim of D. Randolph Martin, assignee of the Washington, Alexandria, and Georgetown Railroad Company, for the use and occupation of the road of the company by the United States from January 11, 1862, till August, 1865, and to pay him such sum as may be found equitably due for such use and occupation.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MARSTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER asked leave of absence for Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia, until next Tuesday.

BOUNTIES.

Mr. ANCONA, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with a recommendation that it be passed, a bill (H. R. No. 1049) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations," &c., approved July 28, 1866, giving additional bounties to discharged soldiers in certain cases.

The bill, which was read at length, provides that claims for the additional bounties provided by the act of July 28, 1866, in cases where the claimant's discharge certificate is alleged to have been accidentally lost or destroyed, may be presented to the Second Auditor of the Treasury for settlement; and upon proper application, accompanied with proofs of such loss, the Auditor is to examine and determine the claim as in like cases of claims settled by him. The payment of any such claim is to be made by a paymaster on the usual form of Treasury certificate issued by the Auditor and countersigned by the Comptroller. The nature of the proofs required and the forms in which they shall be presented are to be prescribed by the Treasury Department. But no provision of the bill is to be construed to relieve a claimant from any requirement prescribed in the act of July 28, 1866, or the regulations of the Secretary of War made in conformity therewith, except the single one requiring the production of the discharge.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ANCONA moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. ANCONA. I move that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 952) supplementary to an act granting additional bounty to certain enlisted soldiers, approved July 28, 1866; and that the bill be laid on the table, as the subject is covered by the bill just passed.

The motion was agreed to.

ARSENAL PROPERTY AT PITTSBURG.

Mr. ANCONA also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill to authorize the purchase of certain lots of ground adjoining the Alleghany arsenal, at Pittsburg, Pennsylvania; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read at length, proposes to authorize and empower the Secretary of War to accept the offer of the St. Francis Hospital Society to sell to the United States certain lots of ground situated in the borough of Lawrenceville, Pennsylvania, numbered one, two, three, and four, containing about ninety-six hundred square feet, and upon which is a spring supplying the arsenal with water. Three thousand eight hundred dollars is appropriated to pay for the lots upon their conveyance to the United States by a good and sufficient title in fee simple.

Mr. ANCONA. The reading of the bill will fully explain its purpose. It goes to this extent and no further: upon these lands adjoining the arsenal is situated a spring from which the arsenal is supplied with water. The United States derived the right to a portion of the water some years ago. The lots are in market and can be bought at a reasonable rate. It is recommended by the War Department that the purchase should be made, and I hope the bill will pass.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ANCONA moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The joint resolution, which was read, directs the payment to Charles B. Wilder, late captain and assistant quartermaster, of the sum of $935, the same having been paid by him, under order of his superior officer, for indemnity.

Mr. SPALDING. I ask for the reading of the report.

The SPEAKER. There is none.

Mr. SPALDING. Let the gentleman explain it.

Mr. DEMING. The gentleman from Ohio calls for the report in this matter. I was but instructed this morning to report this to the House, and have had no time to prepare a written report.

But I will explain the purpose of the joint resolution to the satisfaction of my friend. It seems Captain Wilder, assistant quartermaster, by order of the War Department, was made superintendent of freedmen's affairs in Virginia, and while in charge of those affairs he was ordered by the Government to loan the freedmen certain horses and mules, and as security received a deposit corresponding in value with that of the animals loaned. Subsequently he was relieved from that department, and he paid over to his successor the $935 of deposit. Afterward he was restored to the department, but his predecessor had sunk the money in the Treasury. He was ordered, nevertheless, to return that amount to the freedmen on the return of the animals which had been loaned. This is merely to reimburse him. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. DEMING moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The motion was agreed to.

The joint resolution, which was read, directs that Walter C. Whittaker be paid as colonel of the sixth Kentucky cavalry from 19th September, 1861, to 1st January, 1862, inclusive.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROUSSEAU moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TWENTY-FIRST NEW YORK CAVALRY.

Mr. ANCONA, from the same committee, reported back House bill No. 1003, for the relief of the members of the twenty-first New York cavalry, with an amendment.

The bill directs the payment to the privates and non-commissioned officers of the twenty-first New York cavalry, for traveling expenses from Colorado Territory, where they were mustered out in 1866, to the place of enrollment, the sum of $250 each, deducting the amount paid for commutation of traveling expenses.

The amendment was to add the following proviso:

Provided, however, That the payment shall only be made to such members of said organization who did not elect to be mustered and discharged at the rendezvous where the regiment was to be mustered out: Provided also, The foregoing shall be extended to the first regiment of Michigan cavalry authorized to be paid by section ten of an act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses, approved July 28, 1866.

The amendment was agreed to; and as amended the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to give notice that at the earliest opportunity I shall call up House bill No. 993, to reimburse the loyal States for troops furnished to the Union Army and for expenses incurred in the same, for the purpose of having a vote upon it, not expecting any discussion. The motion to reconsider has been entered, and I give this notice so that gentlemen may not consider the question as being sprung upon them when I call it up.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I suggest to the gentleman to name the day.

Mr. BLAINE. If I can I will do it to-morrow; if not I may on Tuesday next.

NEWSBOYS' HOME.

Mr. INGERSOLL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to amend an act establishing the Newsboys' Home; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. DELANO. I ask unanimous consent to take up from the Speaker's table House bill No. 902, an act to declare the sense of an act entitled "An act to restrict the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims and to provide for the payment of certain demands for quartermasters' stores and subsistence supplies furnished to the Army of the United States," for the purpose of concurring in the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senate was concurred in; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE.

The SPEAKER announced as the next business in order the consideration of bill of the House No. 889, to regulate the civil service of the United States and promote the efficiency thereof, on which Mr. SCHENCK was entitled to the floor.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I would very gladly occupy the attention of the House for a little while in presenting what I deem to be the very great merits of this bill, both as a measure of economy and of wisdom in every respect, and especially as one which I think will secure to this country a very much more equitable administration of all its affairs in the different departments of the civil service; but my colleague on the joint select Committee on Retrenchment, [Mr. JENCKES,] who reported the bill from that committee, has presented the whole subject in so exhaustive and so satisfactory a manner that I deem any further discussion so far as representing the views of the committee to be entirely unnecessary. I shall therefore content myself with presenting some two or three slight amendments to the bill, and will then yield a portion of the hour to which I am entitled to gentlemen who wish to be heard on the subject, intending at the close of the hour, if not sooner, to move the previous question.

I move to amend the bill in section ten by striking out in lines one and two the words "all citizens of the United States," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "none but citizens of the United States, or persons who have served in the Army of the United States and been honorably discharged therefrom."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move further to amend the same section in line three by inserting after the word "act" the words "or to be retained if already in service in any Department;" also in line fourteen by striking out the words "from those of" and inserting the words "the same as." The section, as amended, will then read as follows:

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That none but citizens of the United States, or persons who have served in the Army of the United States and been honorably discharged therefrom, shall be eligible to examination and appointment under the provisions of this act, or to be retained, if already in service in any Department, and the heads of the several Departments may, in their discretion, designate the offices in the several branches of the civil service the duties of which may be performed by females as well as males, and for all such offices females as well as males shall be eligible, and may make application therefor and be examined, recommended, appointed, tried, suspended, and dismissed in manner aforesaid; and the names of those recommended by the examiners shall be placed upon the lists for appointment and promotion in the order of their merit and seniority, and without distinction, other than as aforesaid, the same as male applicants or officers.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. My colleague from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] who desires to move an amendment to the bill, to which I have no objection, is not present, and in his absence I will yield the floor to the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HUBBARD,] who desires to speak for five or ten minutes on this subject.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I rise to bespeak the favor of the House for the bill under consideration. I regard it as one of the most important bills ever offered here since I first had the honor to take a seat in this Hall.

It proposes to inaugurate a new system for the regulation of the civil service of the country, than which nothing can be more needed. It does not appear to have been framed by the distinguished lawyer from Rhode Island, who has charge of it, in hostility to any party, or in the interest of any party, but in the interest of the country and for the best good of all. It is not only not partisan in its character, but it seeks to bring down the partisan leader from his throne. When I contemplate the present vicious system of appointments and removals, which tolerates the practice of so much favoritism and proscription, engendering so much dislike and hatred of the Government, when every one of its acts should be calculated to inspire sentiments of respect and affection; when I see how liable the Government is to suffer in its finances for the want of a more efficient system, I feel certain that there is now pressing upon us a great public necessity for the adoption of the bill. It is emphatically a bill to retrench and reform by way of regulating the civil service of the country. It may have defects; if so, they can be remedied by amendment or by future legislation. It provides for a systematic examination of candidates for office, which shall be open to all, and prefers those who shall be found best qualified, having regard to age, character, and ability. It provides also for just and reasonable inquiry in all cases of alleged misconduct of persons installed in office, by means of which they may be relieved from the odium of the charge if innocent, or may be dismissed from office if found wanting in fidelity to the Government or lacking in ability to discharge the duties assigned to them. These are the operative features of the bill.

It throws wide open the door, and invites all to come in and compete for the honor of a place in the civil service of the country. Be they Republicans or Democrats, they shall be entitled to wear the medal of merit if found worthy. Perhaps one of the best features of the bill is that within its scope it kills out partisanship in appointments to office. As the proposition comes from the Republican side of the House, I hope gentlemen of the Democratic side will accept it and vote for it. I think they will if they love their country, which I do not question. I have not been accustomed to call them disloyal because they differed with me, radically, in political views.

I will take occasion to state right here that upon the breaking out of the rebellion I raised a company of men to fight for the flag, and that one half of them were Democrats. The company was ordered to New Orleans, and fought at Irish Bend and at Port Hudson.

When General Banks called for volunteers to make the second attack upon that impregnable fortress that company, all that had survived of it, under its gallant commander, stepped out to a man and asked to be counted in, and they were half Democrats. The company was then ordered to join the Army of the Potomac, and with thinned ranks they fought with Sheridan when the guns of the enemy shook the hills that skirt the valley in which those three great and glorious victories were won.

Mr. GRINNELL. What are they now?

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. Most of the few who survive vote the Republican ticket. Mr. MILLER. Do any of them vote the Johnson ticket?

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. No, not one. A large proportion of that company has gone down the bourn whence no traveler returns. Republicans and Democrats fought together, and died together, and rest in the same grave. I speak this because it is the truth. I instance what transpired in a single case, partly within my own knowledge, to illustrate what was done all over the country.

It is certainly true that the people of the North raised troops to fight the rebellion without distinction of party. I now propose that we shall vote for this bill regulating the subordinate appointments without distinction of party. It is a business measure, not a party one. The gentleman who reports it is as devoted a Republican as I am; but I declare I would vote for it just as quick if it were reported by any member from the other side of the House.

The bill makes no attack upon executive powers. It provides that the President shall appoint the board of examiners by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. It regards only the subordinate offices, whose name is legion. It will secure honesty, ability, and efficiency in these offices, and thereby save millions of dollars to the people every year. It will furnish a strong incentive to the young to lead honorable and useful lives. A certificate of good character and of efficiency from such a Government board, a board appointed by the President of the United States, will help destitute young men to obtain employment in private life if they fail to get a public office. Thousands upon thousands of poor boys will struggle hard and practice much self-denial to obtain such a prize.

Any one can go before the board, be examined, and take a certificate of good character and of ability, if found worthy. Some of the offices require but little learning, and the certificate will recommend the applicant for such a place as he may be qualified to fill, good character in all cases being indispensable.

The bill comes from one of our most able committees, reported by its distinguished chairman, a gentleman whose great attainments in the science of political economy, as well as in the legal profession, whose high personal character, as well as devoted patriotism, commend his reports to the favorable consideration of the House. In spite of all his other onerous duties here he has spent many a weary hour over this great subject; and whether the bill shall be adopted or rejected, it will stand as a monument to perpetuate the memory of his wisdom and of his devotion to the country so long as the records of this Congress shall last.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now yield to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WOODBRIDGE] for ten minutes.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration was introduced before this body something more than a year ago, and was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, of which I have the honor to be a member. It became my duty, under the direction of that committee, to examine the bill, and I gave it that consideration which I deemed the importance of the subject demanded. At that time I came to the conclusion it would be unwise to pass the measure. My colleagues then on the committee agreed with me and instructed me to report the bill back to the House and ask that the committee be discharged from its further consideration. Out of courtesy, however, to my friend from Rhode Island [Mr. JENCKES] such a course was not taken, and the bill was referred to a select committee, who have now reported it to the House for its action with their approval.

As near as I can recollect, the main features of the bill have not been changed; and I may say, in passing, that for its scope, its clearness, its precision, and its honesty of purpose, it does great credit to my friend from Rhode Island, [Mr. JENCKES], who is its reputed author.

The theory of the bill is perfect. It raises a superstructure which it is delightful to gaze upon; and when gilded over, as it has been by the very able and manly speech of my friend from Rhode Island, it would seem now to have become a magnificent house of refuge, into which the Government may retire and save itself from all the follies and weaknesses of human nature. But like all schemes, which through all time have been devised to free social organization from the natural weaknesses and wickednesses of man, it wants foundation.

Poets have described their Arcadia; and yet no man ever reached one. Speculative and dreamy philosophers have got up communities where selfishness should never enter; where property should be held in common, and where the law of love should reign supreme; and yet no such community ever did exist and never will in this world, at least until the arrival of that glorious day when "the lion and the lamb shall lie down together." Sir, selfishness is imbedded in our nature; and I am sorry to say that often it only wants a little temptation to be developed into wickedness.

Now, I believe that for the aggregation of men in the civil service there is no greater corruption than in other departments of business. Take the gentleman's own profession, noble, manly, elevated as it is, no man can enter it who is not, theoretically at least, of good moral character, and is possessed of considerable learning. Every man who does enter it is brought to reflect and study upon the great cardinal principles of justice and right. And yet, sir, in that profession we find the natural selfishness of man out-cropping into wickedness and corruption. It enters the pulpit itself; it disgraces the marts of trade; it gets into the Halls of Congress; and sometimes, I have no doubt, it soils even the ermine of the judge. Sir, legislation to prevent corruption in the civil service of the Government will be, as such legislation always has been, a failure. Under the operation of this bill, if it should become a law, no department of the Government will, in my judgment, be any purer than it is now.

But, sir, there are other objections to the bill. One is that it is anti-democratic. My friend from Rhode Island has said, and it is undoubtedly true, that Belgium and Prussia and France and England have a similar system of appointing officers to the civil service. But where is the analogy between England and this country? That, sir, is a country of aristocracy, a country of classes, where as a rule a man cannot rise unless he is born to position. In England the coal-heaver of to-day is a coal-heaver on the day of his death. The boy who digs in the mines to-day digs in the mines when his hair is silvered with age. How different here! The cotton-spinner of to-day floats to-morrow upon one of our splendid monitors—the highest achievement of naval architecture upon the inland seas of Europe. The rail-splitter of to-day becomes to-morrow the President of the United States. Here the avenues to position, to power, to wealth, are open to all, and they ought not by any legislation of ours to be closed. In this country the poor man cannot be kept down. The rich man and the man elevated by birth, if he has not the requisite inherent talents, cannot be kept up. The race is to all men. The avenues are all open; and I think it would be dangerous for us to close these avenues to the many and provide a royal road for a fortunate or favored few.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the gentleman allow me a word?

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Yes, sir; although I have but little time left.

Mr. STEVENS. As I understand this bill it provides for an examination of those now in office.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Not necessarily.

Mr. STEVENS. And those not found competent on examination are to be turned out.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. The incompetent will not necessarily be turned out.

Mr. STEVENS. If the report be unfavorable to them they are to be turned out.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. They ought to be. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to allow me a few minutes longer.

Mr. SCHENCK. I give the gentleman an allowance of five minutes more, on the condition that he shall confine himself to the practical view of the question, avoiding the roses and the poetry. [Laughter.]

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Then, again, it is said by my friend on the other side that this bill will prevent removals from office; and hence I suppose he would argue that it will give stability to our institutions. Now, sir, I am not opposed to removals from office. The power of removal is a power the improper exercise of which is doubtless dangerous; yet it is a power the proper exercise of which is healthful. Now, sir, I believe that there should be an occasional change even of administration; and I mean political changes. I believe that such changes are the great safety-valve of a republican form of government. I believe that if any party should control the Republic for a hundred years it would fall apart by reason of its own corruption. The health of the nation requires that the stable shall be occasionally cleaned out. Hence I believe that this system of periodical changes is not a dangerous, but rather a wholesome system.

Again, sir, what are to be the practical workings of this bill? If I understand its provisions correctly it starts out with the appointment of three commissioners at an annual salary of $5,000 each, with their expenses. They are to have a clerk who is to receive $2,000 per annum, and a messenger with a yearly salary of $900. What are to be the powers of these commissioners? They are to prescribe the examination to which applicants for office in the civil service shall be subjected. They divide the territory of the United States at their own convenience and hold their examinations at any point they see fit. Then, again, they have power to appoint assistant examiners all over the country, which I venture to say would create an unheard-of drain upon the Treasury.

This great traveling menagerie, this inquisitorial court, starts out upon its elevating, reformatory, and retrenchment expedition. It goes perhaps to my district and to the capital of my State. A building is hired at the expense of the Government. The bell is rung and the school opens, a poor broken-down old pensioner of the war of 1812 presents himself as an applicant for the position of keeper of a light-house upon our beautiful lake, at a salary of perhaps a hundred dollars a year, or a young one-armed soldier, who fought for the country in the late rebellion, for the post of watchman in the custom-house, or perhaps a sweet and modest maiden presents herself for examination. The messenger ushers her in before this august tribunal: the clerk calls upon her to rise and answer the questions propounded, while he writes out her replies, and the poor girl, in the modesty of her womanly nature, shrinks back in fear and disgust and fails, and is then requested to pay five dollars to the collector of revenue for the privilege of appearing before the commissioners of examination.

But, sir, I do not desire to speak lightly of the bill. It is drawn with care and with the best intentions. It might work in Belgium, France, or England, where the masses are mere machines; but in free America it will never work.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I now yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Rhode Island.

Mr. JENCKES. Mr. Speaker, I am not one of those who believe in the sudden coming of any millennium, political or other, and do not expect, if this bill becomes a law, all of those results which have been painted in such glowing language by the eloquent gentleman from Vermont.

When I first entered the public service of this Government during the war, I could not but be struck at once at the great difference between the military and naval administrations and that of the civil departments. It led me to inquire into the cause of this great difference, and to see whether such difference existed in the systems of other nations. I found that in England, during the Crimean war, what indeed I had in part known previously, great complaint existed against the civil service from its almost total inefficiency, arising, as admitted and proclaimed, from the vicious mode of appointments to office in that service.

I learned that the evil in England had almost been entirely cured, and I looked into her history to find the reason of the change. I found it, sir, in the adoption of a wise and practical system regulating the appointments in the different departments of the civil service. That complaint was against almost every officer; then there was a "Tite Barnacle" in every office trying "how not to do it;" and live men have been put in office, and in every strain which has come upon the English civil service it has responded nobly. I found the same cause to exist here, and believed I had discovered that the deficiency in our civil service is the result of the same vicious mode of appointment. Acting on that belief, and after studying with great care other systems, I presented a bill at the opening of this Congress, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The bill has since undergone the scrutiny of two committees. The subject was referred to the Committee on Retrenchment. They took it into consideration, and directed me to report the bill now before the House.

From what I have seen in my experience it is my profound conviction this measure ought to be adopted. With the other members of the Committee on Retrenchment I have been through the different offices here, and have visited custom-houses and other public offices elsewhere. We have examined their accounts, their regulations, their mode of doing business, and in my judgment a more vicious system does not exist in any civilized nation on the face of the earth. Every other civilized nation has reformed its system except ours; and while we have in the Military and Navy Departments excelled perhaps other nations, so that we can point with pride to the personnel of our forces, both on sea and land, yet who speaks with pride of those who are working in these treadmills of the public service, thrust in by political preference or personal liking, and who hold on to their places just for the purpose of earning sufficient to get a livelihood, doing as little as they can?

The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WOODBRIDGE] says his remarks are based upon an examination of this bill. Sir, he has not seen the bill now before the House. The first draft of it contains many of the provisions here, it is true, but not all of them; but if what he says now is the result of the memory of what he had in his mind one year ago, then his memory must have failed altogether.

He says this system cannot prevent fraud and robbery in the public service. Why, Mr. Speaker, in the present service is there any check whatever upon fraud and swindling? Where do you find it? Why do we send out investigating committees every session with power to search through custom-houses, post offices, and Departments at Washington? Why is it that these frauds exist? Turn to the system of France and you will find the name of every man that has entered the civil service there for a hundred years past upon the record, with the date of his birth, time of his entry, degree of his standing, whether any complaint existed against him, the degree of merit or demerit in his career, whether continued till death, or if dismissed, stating for what cause.

If you look at the statement of Minister Bigelow appended to the report you will find that the director of finances, at the time he wrote, entered the public service in the lowest position and rose to the highest attainable under their law by gradual promotion for meritorious service.

If you look at Prussia you will find a system even more exact and exacting than that of France. Who, in the recent great strain upon the Government of Prussia in its gigantic struggle with Austria, heard any complaint in regard to its civil service? Where was there a clerk who forgot the order of the council of war to send arms and munitions? Where were their messengers of the departments running hither and thither, as during the Crimean war, with articles of subsistence for troops and no troops to receive them? Nowhere. The system worked to perfection; it was more than successful; it placed Prussia among the highest of the continental Powers. That was due chiefly to the perfection of the civil service, whose discipline contributed to the perfect equipment and supply of her army.

But the gentleman says this system may work well in Prussia or in England, but not in America. Here he is sadly at fault. The effect of the system in England and Prussia has been, not to bring the scions of the aristocracy into the service as heretofore, but to exclude them. Those who have gone to work "with peasant's heart and arm" have crowded out the sons of the aristocracy; and to the vigor of the hardy yeomanry very much of the perfection of the service is due. We propose hereafter to throw the door open to all the people. Let him who can best serve the people be entitled to serve them and to the reward of his service.

The gentleman says he believes in change; and he advocates the present system because changes take place in it. What is the change under the present system? Why, the first appointment is for partisan service or for personal considerations, without any regard whatever to the fitness of the man for the place to which he is appointed.

No one perhaps would appoint a man absolutely incapable, one who could not write or spell, or a blind man, to office. But the Government now in almost every case has to pay for the education of its servants. Is that right? Is it not a waste of the public money? Can we justify ourselves in going on with a system of national education to provide incumbents for at least twenty-five thousand offices, when during their education the Government is suffering all the while from their ignorance? This proposed system would save all that. It requires that those who present themselves shall have the requisite qualifications for the places they seek, and shall not be promoted except they prove themselves to be efficient officers.

There was another phase of the present system upon which the gentleman dwelt briefly, and I was glad he did it; and it is this, that as soon as a man begins to understand the duties of his office he is removed, and another man as incompetent as he was when he took it is put in his place. Thus the Government proceeds in this course of experimental education with no benefit to itself or to the people. If this be a healthful system let the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WOODBRIDGE] make the most of it. I am not aware that such a system ever took root in his native State. There I believe no one can teach even a primary school without an examination as to his or her qualifications as a teacher. This system is applied to the schools all over the country. Why should it not be applied to the clerks in the Departments and to the officers in the custom-houses?

Another thing, when these men, after such an examination as is here provided for, enter the services every man has his eye upon every other just as in the Army or Navy. If in the military or naval service an officer is guilty of peculation charges would be made against him. In France there is a record kept of the services of every officer, and every charge against him, his successful vindication of himself, or his being convicted, or punished, is recorded in a permanent record. Sir, I speak of these things from some knowledge of them. The committee saw with its own eyes how these matters are. Who that comes from England on a steamer is not invited to slip a greenback into the hands of some custom-house official at New York, not as a bribe, of course, but in order to facilitate the business of getting his baggage through the custom-house? What merchant is there who brings goods through the custom-house at New York who has not to pay, not only the duties prescribed by law, but to pay something to some man connected with the customs department who after office hours will arrange to get his goods in in advance of anybody else? They do not call it bribery, but simply expediting business.

It seems to me, sir, that the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WOODBRIDGE] does not recollect the scope of this bill, although he pronounced a glowing eulogium upon it. He seems to have the idea that the commission to be appointed under it is to go about the country holding meetings like school committees previous to opening schools. He cannot have looked into the books descriptive of the civil service of England, or of any of the continental nations of Europe, or he could never have entertained such an idea. There is nothing formal or imposing about these examinations. They simply apply those tests which are applied to school-teachers all over this land when they seek employment in their profession. They are to be conducted with dignity and decorum, in quiet and with order, and the final result will be sent back to the central board in Washington, a list being made out of those candidates who prove to be competent. That will end the duties of the commission, and the heads of the Departments who seek faithful servants will be sure they have them when they select them from these lists.

Now, let me say one word about the practicability of this measure. We have taken testimony upon this subject which has been published. I have personally made inquiries of all those who would be called upon to administer this law. They all say that it would be perfectly practicable; that three commissioners, with their assistants, can do all the work that is required. In England there are but two commissioners, with their assistants, twenty-one in number, in different parts of the kingdom, all men of learning and character. In this bill we provide that a small fee shall be paid for an examination, which I have no doubt will pay all the expenses, not only for the salaries of the commissioners but their traveling expenses, and perhaps even more than that.

I will state one remarkable instance of the working of this system in the English service. A year or two ago there were eight vacancies in the office of the under-secretary of state for India. In the Indian service competition is open to all, and there were some seven hundred and odd applicants for these eight vacancies. About four hundred appeared before the commissioners for examination. Of those four hundred many received certificates that they possessed more than the minimum qualifications. The eight persons who were selected and who went into the employment of the Government in India not only possessed the minimum qualifications, but very nearly the maximum; and they also obtained certificates of merit in other studies, in other languages, in other sciences than those required by the rule. In that way the Indian government secured the services of probably eight of the best-fitted men within the limits of Great Britain. Among them was one who came all the way from India to be examined; a Brahmin of high caste and pure blood, who obtained one of the situations.

It has been suggested that these examinations might be had in the different Departments; but I have ascertained and believe that it is practicable for one commission to do all this service, and to do it well. And now, as it never could have been done before in our whole history, except perhaps on one or two occasions, this commission can be constituted without reference to party. We can secure worthy and competent men, who will discharge their duties faithfully and satisfactorily to the nation. And if they do not produce the political millennium in the civil service, which the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WOODBRIDGE] portrays, they will at least contribute to lift us out of the disgraceful condition in which our civil service now is.

Mr. SCHENCK. If this bill, so far as the action of this House is concerned, should not become a law, it will be on account of the most extraordinary opposition ever made perhaps to any measure presented for action. Any one who heard the exceedingly poetical and imaginative speech of my friend from Vermont [Mr. WOODBRIDGE] must have been struck with the singular character of his assault on this bill. If the bill is to die, it will die because it is smothered with roses. But it strikes me it will be about as easy to batter down a stone wall with flowers as to break down a measure so substantial in its character and merits as this appears to me to be with the weapons the gentleman used against it. In the midst of all that poetry with which he entertained us it is difficult to ascertain any particular point he made. But one at least may be taken hold of, as that upon which he seemed to place his principal reliance: that this bill is anti-democratic in its character.

A word then upon that point. Why is it anti-democratic? Is it because it throws open these places in the different Departments of the Government, to be occupied without distinction by all men, rich and poor, and by persons of both sexes, according to their merits as evidenced and ascertained upon an examination in order to determine whether they have the necessary qualifications? Is there anything in the bill itself which makes this an "anti-democratic" measure? It provides that appointments shall be made "from those persons who shall have been found best qualified for the performance of the duties of the offices to which such appointments are to be made, in an open and competitive examination, to be conducted as prescribed" in the bill. Now, sir, the "beautiful girl" from Vermont, (and I know that Vermont has beautiful girls,) and the "one-legged soldier" seeking occupation would, when brought before a board of examiners, be entitled to have their qualifications fairly measured by the requirements of the office to be filled. And I can imagine many cases in which your "one-legged soldier" or your "beautiful girl" from Vermont would come out with flying colors, manifesting all necessary fitness to fill the places to which they might aspire with credit to themselves and advantage to the Government. I do not rate the intelligence of the girls of Vermont, I do not measure the capacity of our one-legged soldiers, by so low a standard as that of the gentleman from Vermont. I hold that they can enter into a competitive examination for the positions to which they aspire with as good a prospect as any others may have of passing through the ordeal successfully.

But what does the gentleman want in order to make this bill less "anti-democratic?" If he is serious in his objection, I suggest that, to make the bill conform to his ideas, he ought to move to amend by striking out the provision that appointments shall be made from those persons who, in an open, competitive examination, shall be found best qualified; and inserting something like this, which will accomplish the object the gentleman seems to have in view:

That the appointments shall be made from such persons as are recommended by a member of Congress from Vermont or some other State, for services performed in securing by treats of liquor or otherwise the votes of Bill Johnson and Sam Smith for said member at the last preceding election. [Laughter.]

If the gentleman wants to change the present character of the bill, I admit that this would do it. If he prefers the present condition of things let him endeavor to induce this House to reject all propositions to introduce a mode of proceeding by which the best ability of the country for the particular places shall be secured; let him persuade the House to adhere to the present system of making official appointments depend upon the personal and political influence which the applicant may be able to bring to bear, without regard to his want of qualifications for the position sought. I presume no gentleman will deny that this is the manner in which appointments are secured under the present system.

It may be said that there are examinations now. But who does not know that those examinations are little better than a farce? Who does not know that in such examinations those succeed whom the heads of the bureaus or Departments wish to succeed, and those are rejected who are not agreeable to "the powers that be?" But what sort of examinations would the gentleman have in these cases if he prefers that the old condition of things shall be continued? Instead of inquiring in regard to those very inconsiderable accomplishments—reading, writing, arithmetic, &c., I suppose he would have the candidate subjected to an inquiry to ascertain his skill in packing a convention to procure the nomination of a friend to office; to determine his expertness in writing a letter for the newspapers, bepuffing his patron here in Congress or elsewhere.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I only desire to say that the gentleman from Ohio may understand such things; but we in Vermont do not.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not know much about the way they manage matters in Vermont, but from the manner in which the gentleman has described the treatment to which the "beautiful girl" would be subjected I should suspect the gallantry of the people there, however good they may be in other respects.

What is his real objection? I will give the precise language used by the gentleman from Vermont. He admits "the scope, the excellent scope, the clearness, the precision, and the good purpose of the bill." But what is its fault? He says "it is too good; it smacks of Arcadia. It approaches too near an attempt to bring about the millennium, when the lamb and lion are to lie down together."

The heavy fault, then, of the bill is its merits. If it prevails, appointments will be made with reference to merit and that alone. It is a most strange objection to be made to a measure introduced into this House that it is too good to be passed. We have in the midst of a variety of subjects before us at length hit upon something so excellent in character, and in Heaven's name let us not put the legislative boon away from us. But really and truly, without distorting the argument, his whole objection seems to turn upon the sole idea this fair principle is too sublime, too pure, too excellent to be fitted for the condition of the men who administer the Executive Departments of the Government.

It is said these commissioners will not perform their duty properly. We must in all things act through human agencies, and in matters of this sort could a better plan be devised for getting examiners? Instead of having two or three clerks, tools and instruments of the head of the Department, selected to pass friends through, and none others, it is proposed to elevate these commissioners into dignity and importance, who shall in every instance be nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate, and be incapable of removal except by consent of the Senate. That is the language of the bill fairly and fully. If you cannot trust these, whom can you trust? I find there is only one minute of my time left.

Mr. McKEE. With the gentleman's consent, I move to amend by adding in section ten, line three, after the word "act:"

Except those who have voluntarily aided or encouraged any insurrection or rebellion against the Government of the United States.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I offer, so it may be pending, the following amendment:

Add the following proviso to section five: Provided, however, That any person holding office in the said civil service of the United States, who shall, directly or indirectly, contribute or use any money or do any act (other than to vote) in aid of or to promote the success of any candidate or party at any election of Federal, State, county, city, or town officers, or shall be a candidate for nomination or election to any such office, shall be deemed guilty of misconduct in his said office, and be removed therefrom.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question recurred on Mr. McKEE's amendment.

Mr. LE BLOND demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STEVENS moved that the bill be laid on the table.

Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 72, nays 66, not voting 52; as follows:

So the bill was laid on the table.

During the roll-call,

Mr. JENCKES changed his vote from the negative to the affirmative.

The result having been announced as above, Mr. JENCKES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was laid on the table.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. With the consent of the gentleman from Rhode Island, I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the motion to allow me to report a bill from the joint Committee on Reconstruction.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Connecticut, who moved to adjourn.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If I can I will withdraw the motion to adjourn, and yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Several MEMBERS objected.

Mr. JENCKES. I withdraw the motion to adjourn and to reconsider for the purpose of allowing the gentleman from Pennsylvania to report his bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I report from the joint Committee on Reconstruction a bill.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a privileged motion, to reconsider the vote by which the civil service bill was laid on the table, and to lay that motion on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who rises to a privileged question; but will also recognize the privileged motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] when the gentleman from Pennsylvania has presented his privileged motion.

GOVERNMENT OF INSURRECTIONARY STATES.

Mr. STEVENS. I report from the joint select Committee on Reconstruction a bill to provide for the more efficient government of the insurrectionary States.

The bill was read a first and second time; and the question was on ordering it to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. LE BLOND. I wish to inquire of the Speaker whether it is the intention to put this bill on its passage now?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know; he does not even know what the bill is.

Mr. STEVENS. I will say that if there is any objection I shall not urge it to-night.

Several MEMBERS called for the reading of the bill.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. To save time, and with a view to having the bill printed, I object.

The SPEAKER. Any member has a right to demand that it be read.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I understood the gentleman to say that if there was any objection he would not proceed.

The SPEAKER. He said he would not press it to a final passage to-night if there was objection.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Well, then, I object.

The bill was read as follows:

Whereas the pretended State governments of the late so-called Confederate States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana, Florida, Texas, and Arkansas were set up without the authority of Congress and without the sanction of the people; and whereas said pretended governments afford no adequate protection for life or property, but countenance and encourage lawlessness and crime; and whereas it is necessary that peace and good order should be enforced in said so-called States until loyal and republican State governments can be legally established: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That said so-called States shall be divided into military districts and made subject to the military authority of the United States, as hereinafter prescribed; and for that purpose Virginia shall constitute the first district, North Carolina and South Carolina the second district, Georgia, Alabama, and Florida the third district, Mississippi and Arkansas the fourth district, and Louisiana and Texas the fifth district.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the general of the Army to assign to the command of each of said districts an officer of the regular Army not below the rank of brigadier general, and to detail a sufficient force to enable such officer to perform his duties and enforce his authority within the district to which he is assigned.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of each officer assigned, as aforesaid, to protect all persons in their rights of person and property, to suppress insurrection, disorder, and violence, and to punish, or cause to be punished, all disturbers of the public peace and criminals; and to this end he may allow civil tribunals to take jurisdiction of and to try offenders, or when in his judgment it may be necessary for the trial of offenders he shall have power to organize military commissions or tribunals for that purpose, anything in the constitution and laws of the so-called States to the contrary notwithstanding; and all legislative or judicial proceedings or processes to prevent the trial or proceedings of such tribunals, and all interference by said pretended State governments with the exercise of military authority under this act shall be void and of no effect.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That courts and judicial officers of the United States shall not issue writs of habeas corpus in behalf of persons in military custody unless some commissioned officer on duty in the district wherein the person is detained shall indorse upon said petition a statement certifying upon honor that he has knowledge of the alleged detention, and that he believes the same to be rightful; and further, that he believes that the indorsed petition is preferred in good faith and in furtherance of justice, and not to hinder or delay the punishment of crime. All persons put under military arrest, by virtue of this act, shall be tried without unnecessary delay, and no cruel or unusual punishment shall be inflicted.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That no sentence of any military commission or tribunal hereby authorized, affecting the life or liberty of any person, shall be executed until it is approved by the officer in command of the district; and the laws and regulations for the government of the Army shall not be affected by this act, except in so far as they conflict with its provisions.

Mr. STEVENS. I would inquire of the Chair what would be the effect of moving to recommit this bill and then adjourning?

The SPEAKER. If the House adjourns now this bill will be the first business in order after the reading of the Journal, without any motion to recommit. It is now the first business in order until disposed of.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the bill be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] permit me to offer an amendment to the preamble and also an amendment to the fourth section of the bill, in order that the bill and amendments may be printed together?

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the bill be recommitted; and now I think we better adjourn.

Mr. BINGHAM. Does not the motion to recommit cut off all opportunity to amend?

The SPEAKER. It does, while the motion to recommit is pending.

Mr. LE BLOND. I desire to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] I understand that this bill just now introduced will be the first business to be considered to-morrow after the reading of the Journal. Does the gentleman propose to put this bill upon its passage within any specified time, and if so, how soon?

Mr. STEVENS. I think I shall ask that it be put upon its passage to-morrow.

Mr. LE BLOND. And the bill to be printed between now and when Congress shall convene to-morrow?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, sir.

Mr. LE BLOND. Without permitting any debate upon it?

Mr. STEVENS. Well, sir, I am very willing that the debate which has been going on here for three weeks, and which the gentleman will find in the Globe, shall all be read over by him whenever he can take time to read it. [Laughter.] But I do not see any necessity for any further debate beyond to-morrow.

Mr. LE BLOND. I appeal to the gentleman whether it is proper, upon a bill of the character of the one just introduced, of the magnitude of this bill, establishing military jurisdiction over all these States, is it proper to pass it here without even an hour's debate upon it? I appeal to the gentleman to allow some latitude of debate upon this bill; to fix some future day for final action upon it, and allow a reasonable debate upon it, without forcing it to its passage at so early a period.

Mr. STEVENS. I have indicated no intention to ask a vote upon this bill without a half an hour's debate upon it. On the contrary, if the gentleman asks it I will yield that much to him.

Mr. LE BLOND. I do not ask it on behalf of myself.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, of anybody else.

Mr. LE BLOND. On behalf of the American people I ask more time for debate. If I had the power I would demand it as a right on behalf of the American people. I ask the gentleman to name a time some days hence, and allow a reasonable debate upon so important a proposition as this.

Mr. STEVENS. I will see what the American people think of it in the morning. [Laughter.] If they are generally for a prolongation of the debate, of course I will go with them. But I will wait until then, in order to ascertain what the American people want. In the mean time I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. LE BLOND. I will tell the gentleman what the American people want. They want the Constitution and laws of the country preserved and obeyed; they want men to be tried in pursuance of the Constitution and the laws, and not by military despotism, as this bill provides.

Mr. STEVENS. I insist upon my motion to adjourn.

Mr. DELANO. Will the gentleman withdraw that motion for a moment, in order to enable me to submit a resolution, which will give rise to no debate?

Mr. STEVENS. I will withdraw the motion to adjourn if the gentleman will renew it.

Mr. DELANO. I will do so.

PARKER AND MATTHEWS.

Mr. DELANO. I now offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prosecution of the claim of David Stout Parker and Forman Matthews, owners of the schooner Twilight, against the United States, in the Court of Claims, under and by virtue of a resolution of this House, dated March 20, 1866, referring said claim to said court, but which by mistake was described as the claim of "J. Stout Parker," and all the proceeding hitherto had thereon, are hereby legalized, and that they shall and may be continued in said court, under said reference, with the same force and effect in all respects as if no such mistake had been made in the name of said claimant.

I will state that the object of this resolution is simply to correct a mistake which was made in the name of the claimants when the case was referred to the Court of Claims last session.

The SPEAKER. The Chair doubts if the gentleman can attain his object by a single House resolution.

Mr. DELANO. Oh, yes, sir. It needs only a resolution of the House to refer a claim to the Court of Claims.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that the decision of the Court of Claims has been otherwise.

Mr. DELANO. The House passed a resolution referring this claim to the court last session, and this is merely to correct an error in the name of one of the parties.

The resolution was agreed to.

PRIVILEGED QUESTION.

Mr. WINDOM. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the reports of the Committee on Indian Affairs in regard to the administration of the Indian Bureau were recommitted to the committee.

The motion was accordingly entered.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had indefinitely postponed bill of the House No. 668, to limit the time for bringing suits before the Court of Claims.

Mr. DELANO. I now renew the motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

Mr. SUMNER. I also present a petition, numerously signed, from citizens of Arkansas, in which they ask that the loyal people of the State shall be recognized as the only true basis of the government, and that Congress would declare that all loyal men, without distinction of color, are entitled to vote. #### PENSION BILLS.

Mr. LANE. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions to report the following resolution, and to ask for its immediate consideration:

By unanimous consent the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. POMEROY. I suggest that the evening be the 14th. I know that there are some Senators who have engagements for the 13th.

Mr. LANE. I have no objection to that amendment. I accept the modification and name the 14th.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

PRINTING OF DOCUMENTS.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print ten thousand copies of the report of J. Ross Browne upon mines and mining, have instructed me to report it back with an amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the resolution.

The amendment was, after the word "printed" to insert "and bound;" and at the end of the resolution to add "with a title page and index;" so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That ten thousand copies of the report of J. Ross Browne to the Treasury Department, on the statistics of mines and mining, be printed and bound for the use of the Senate, with a title page and index.

The amendment was agreed to; and the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. POMEROY. The Committee on Printing yesterday morning made a report in favor of printing a memorial, which was presented by me the previous day, from the officers and managers of the National Association for the Relief of Destitute Colored Women and Children, relative to a law-suit instituted against them by R. S. Coxe; but there was no action taken on the report yesterday, and I suggest that it be now taken up and disposed of.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion to print the memorial referred to, and it was agreed to.

TENURE OF OFFICE.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the House amendment to the tenure-of-office bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 453) regulating the tenure of certain civil offices, which was to strike out in the first section of the bill the words "excepting the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, and of the Interior, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General."

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, this bill concerns the power of the President of the United States to remove from office those who have been appointed by him with the advice and consent of the Senate. That power is not derived from the Constitution. By the Constitution of the United States the President has no more right to remove such an officer than he has to butcher him: not a whit. And I will tell you how I know it; for I assert it as much as a matter of fact as I do as a matter of law. I know it because I have read in the Constitution itself the enumeration of the powers which are granted to the President, and this is not among them; and there is nothing among them which bears the slightest similitude or likeness to the power in question. And to convince the Senate of that, if the Senate care anything about that, I propose to read this enumeration of powers. It is said:

"The President shall be Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several States, when called into the actual service of the United States."

There is nothing in that bearing the slightest similitude to the power in question.

"He may require the opinion, in writing, of the principal officer in each of the Executive Departments upon any subject relating to the duties of their respective offices."

To require a written opinion upon any subject from an officer of the Government is a very different thing from dismissing the officer from the public employ.

"He shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment."

"He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments."

"The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session."

"He shall from time to time give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in case of disagreement between them, with respect to the time of adjournment, he may adjourn them to such time as he shall think proper; he shall receive ambassadors and other public ministers; he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed, and shall commission all the officers of the United States."

There is an enumeration of the powers which by the Constitution are vested in the President, an enumeration of the whole of them. As I said before, this power to remove from office is not there, and nothing in the likeness of that power is there; and because I do not find it there, I say, as I said before, that the President has not that power in the Constitution.

But that is not the only reason why I say this power is not conferred upon him by the Constitution. I find by reading the Constitution precisely where this power of removal is vested by that instrument. By reading the fourth section of this same article, article two, you find where this power of removal is vested. That section declares that—"The President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors."

There is where the power of removal is. It is in the court of impeachment, and by this instrument it is nowhere else. The Constitution, I say to you as a fact, left the power to remove a postmaster precisely where it left the power to remove a judge, and nowhere else; and why did it do this? For a good reason. The Constitution of the United States intended that men living under it should be free men, that conduct should be free, above all that opinion should be free; and they meant that this freedom should be enjoyed as much by the men who hold office as by the men who do not hold office; and therefore every officer that the Constitution created had assigned to it a fixed term, and every incumbent of such an office was exempt from this summary power of removal. The President has a fixed term; and you cannot remove him but through the court of impeachment. The Vice President has a fixed term. The judges have a fixed term of office. Representatives and Senators in Congress have severally fixed terms assigned to their offices; and although it was designed that Representatives and Senators should be primarily the advocates, not so much of their own opinions as of the opinions of their constituents, yet it was not provided that there should be a summary power of removal of even these officers by their constituencies. They may fail or refuse to represent the views of their constituents, and yet for the time being during the continuance of their term they are independent of the power of their constituents.

But, Mr. President, the framers of the Constitution could not foresee all the officers who might be required to administer this great Government of ours. They actually created but few offices. They left the work of creating others which might be found necessary to the legislative department of the Government. I think the framers of that Constitution supposed that the legislative department would imitate their example, and so often as they created a new office would fix the term of it and secure to the incumbent of it an estate in it during the existence of the term, and leave him independent in that office, subject to removal only by the intervention of that great tribunal which can remove a President, a Vice President, or a judge.

But it so happens that the very first office created after the Government was instituted was that first called the Department of Foreign Affairs and now called the Department of State, created during the first session of the First Congress which assembled under our Constitution. I find it was the fourth act enacted by that body. I regret to say that that Legislature did not follow the example set by the Constitution, did not assign to that office a fixed term, did not secure the independence of the incumbent for a day. The language of that act is very peculiar and extraordinary. I read only the second section. The second section is as follows:

"That there shall be in the said Department an inferior officer, to be appointed by the said principal officer, and to be employed therein as he shall deem proper, and to be called the chief clerk in the Department of Foreign Affairs, and who, whenever the said principal officer shall be removed from office by the President of the United States, or in any other case of vacancy, shall, during such vacancy, have the charge and custody of all records, books, and papers appertaining to the said Department."

The purpose of that section apparently is simply to determine who shall have charge of the office in case of vacancy; but into this section is injected terms which made the incumbent the mere creature of the President, and limited the duration of his term to the pleasure of the President. It was not in the terms of grant, because to have employed terms of grant would have been a plain denial that the Constitution did grant that power to the President. If it had been the judgment of that Congress that the Constitution conferred this power of removal upon the President, then they would have said nothing about his being removed by the President, but they would have employed the ordinary terms and have said that in case of resignation, death, or vacancy occasioned by other cause, the chief clerk should have charge of the Department. But the members of that Congress knew it would not do to employ that language, because they knew that the Constitution had conferred no such power on the President to create a vacancy, and they meant to inject this power into this statute, and yet avoid the use of language which would amount to an express grant. I do not hesitate to say that that is a dishonest statute. There were not men enough in that Congress who believed the Constitution gave this power to the President to affirm that doctrine; there were not men enough in that Congress who thought the President ought to have the power to grant it to him; and they combined the two ideas, they combined the two factions, those who thought or pretended to think that the Constitution gave the power to the President, and those who thought the President ought to have the power, and compromised by the use of the language which I have read to you.

Mr. President, I say that is a dishonest statute, and I say further, that that very cowardly and skulking statute has done more to debauch American politics and American life than any other one cause; and I seriously doubt if it has not done more than all other causes combined; for that is the parent of this whole doctrine. It all sprung from that little source. Following upon this cowardly precedent have come all those statutes which have relinquished the whole control of the immense patronage belonging to this Government to the President of the United States.

The effect of this has been most disastrous everywhere and upon everybody. Office-holders, the subordinates of the President, have been reduced to a sort of spanielism that is contemptible to behold anywhere. You see it everywhere. I do not mean that you see it in every office-holder. I thank my God and congratulate the country that we have gradually, in spite of this, educated up a class of men who love principle, who love individual honor, and who love the public welfare even better than they love office; and we have seen a host of them during the last sad twelve months laid upon the altar because they did love principle, honor, and country better than office; but in their places have come a host of these very tools to whom I referred, who love office and place and emoluments better than they love honor, better than they love principle, better than they love country, better than they love all put together.

You saw and you read and you heard a great deal of the movements of what were called the departmental clubs organized here out of mere office-holders in the city of Washington during the last political canvass. You have seen another consequence growing out of this: you have seen men, good men, men who would not change their principles to hold on to an office, but would cushion them, stifle them, men who would not give up a conviction, but would hold on to it and keep still over it. And you have seen another class of men: you have seen a class of men who were all things to all men, who were always in agreement with the very man or the very society they were talking with and conferring with on both sides of all questions.

That is the effect of this system upon men holding office; but upon men outside, men who do not hold office, it has had a most disastrous effect, a most demoralizing tendency. You have, all of you, seen it during last summer. Office has been employed, patronage has been employed during the last summer in a way that it was never employed before, and for purposes for which, perhaps, it was never employed before, not as the reward of a party, but for the purpose of purchasing reinforcement ments for a party. Offices have been held out as baits in every community to induce men to betray their convictions, to desert one party and to adhere to another.

Whoever has practiced the profession of an angler knows very well that the moment he drops his bait and hook into the water it will be surrounded by a school of fish, larger or smaller, nimble or more lubberly, all striving to get the bait, and all anxious to avoid the hook. The struggle is to get the bait if they can without taking the hook, while the effort of the angler is to get a fish when he loses his bait; sometimes the bait goes and no fish is caught; sometimes a lubber gets hold of the hook and is drawn to shore. You have seen that process enacted over and over again in every community in the United States during the past summer where you have been. Every one of these offices has been held out as a bait, and you have seen a little school, a very small number I admit, of politicians gathered around it; every one of them manifestly animated by the desire to get the office if he could without giving up his principles, without giving up his party associations, his party affiliations, but determined to get the office. Some very shrewd and active ones ran off with the office and did not give up their party associations; but some more clumsy fellows took the offices, took the principles, took the conditions, and were landed on the President's policy. But, then, that is not a happy state of things in American society nor in any other society. It is not a state of affairs which ought to be perpetual, which anybody ought to be ambitious to perpetuate. It is one which I am not ambitious of perpetuating.

But, Mr. President, while it has had this effect upon subordinates in office, this disastrous effect upon society generally, it has had a more evil tendency still, I think, upon the office of the President himself. It has made the President, instead of an honest and faithful and laborious servant of the American people, the captain of a great band, numbering from thirty to forty thousand office-holders; not merely the captain of that great band, but the confessor to it, the man—or the priest, if you please—to whom they go, regularly or irregularly, to make confession of faith, and I dare say of conduct also.

Mr. President, in the earlier and happier days of the Republic the questions asked about an aspirant for office were: is he honest? is he faithful? is he capable? Those questions are no longer put to anybody. The only question put now is: does he support the President's policy?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the honorable Senator allow me to ask him one question just there?

Mr. HOWE. Certainly.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to know of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin whether those were the only questions put to applicants for office under the administration of Mr. Lincoln?

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, those were the only questions put during the administration of Mr. Lincoln, so far as I know the catechism. After Mr. Lincoln was inaugurated, it is within my recollection, and I dare say within the recollection of the Senator from Delaware—no; I beg to correct myself; these were not the only questions put. There was one other question put, and I do not know but that was the main question; I do not know but that even these were sometimes left out of the catechism. The great question put during the administration of Mr. Lincoln was, "Is he loyal to the flag and the Constitution of his country?" And if that was answered in the affirmative, preferences were open to all men alike, according to their ability to fill them.

Mr. SAULSBURY. One other question, and I will not trouble the Senator further. Does the honorable Senator mean to be understood to say here in the Senate that all the removals, or any considerable portion of them, made by Mr. Lincoln in the States which had never assumed to secede were removals of disloyal men, men not true to the Government?

Mr. HOWE. I mean to say as a matter within my own knowledge that from the time the rebellion was inaugurated it was useless for us in the West to assign as a cause for removal that a man had voted for Douglas or for Bell or for Breckinridge or for anybody against Mr. Lincoln. If the fact were found to be, that in spite of his party affiliations during the fall before, in the spring and after the standard of revolt was raised he was then under the flag and willing to defend it, he was safe in his office so far as Mr. Lincoln was concerned. But before that time undoubtedly there were a great many removed from office by Mr. Lincoln for the reason that they had not supported Mr. Lincoln's election; and I find no fault with that. I find no fault with such an exercise of patronage as that at any time. When the two great parties of the country make up their issue and go to the people upon it, if the people decide in favor of one set of measures and against another I concede their right to have not only a President who is in favor of their system and of their measures, but the right to have a postmaster, and the right to have collectors, and the right to have assessors and Indian agents, and all kinds of civil employes of their way of thinking. I find no special fault with that doctrine, which I believe has been preached only for thirty or forty years, that to the victors belong the spoils; but the victory which entitles a man or a party to the spoils is a victory which is achieved by the assent of the American people; it is not a victory which is attained by desertion. If General Grant, instead of moving on the lines of General Lee before Richmond had moved over and joined the rebel forces, I do not think that would have been such a victory over the Federal flag as would have authorized Grant's troops to plunder his own camp; and when a President leaves the party which elected him and goes over to the party which refused to elect him, I do not think that is one of those heroic victories which authorizes him to turn over the patronage of the country to the few followers who gather about him.

The employment of this patronage has had the effect, not merely to change the character, but to change the very occupations of the President. By law he is the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States; but you no longer see your President employed in studying the art of war. He is the organ of the American nation in communicating with other nations and potentates of the earth; but you no longer see the President employed in studying international law. He is the head of the nation; he knows that the nation is staggering under a load of debt; he knows that it is oppressed as it never has been oppressed before; but you do not see the President employing his time in the study of systems of finance or systems of labor or systems of economy. He has no time for these things. His time is absorbed in weighing the relative merits of rival candidates for a collectorship or for a post office.

But, sir, it has had a worse effect than either of these, perhaps than all of these, upon the President. It has gone very far to drag him out of the sphere to which the Constitution assigned him, and to plant him in the very sphere which the Constitution denied to him and assigned to the Congress of the United States. He is no longer content with the labor of executing the American will and enforcing American law. The President seems to be mainly ambitious of making American law and of dictating to the American will. The bold attempt (though not the first, I am obliged to admit,) we have ever seen of this we have seen within the past year and a half and during the Administration of the present President. You have seen the President enter boldly upon the field of legislation. You have seen him go into ten great American communities, which he says are States, which had the lineaments of States, which had governments over them; you have seen him deliberately take those organizations all to pieces, without any authority of law in the world, and you have seen him take the very same material out of which they were built and build new organizations; and then you have seen him turn around and confront the American Congress and tell them that they must recognize those organizations which he made himself, and clothe them with the prerogatives of American States; and when you hesitated to do that, when you refused to do that, you have seen him turn to the American people, your constituents, the men whose representatives you are, and tell them to remove you from your places; and he really hoped to do it, he really hoped to secure a verdict of your constituents against your acts. What was the ground of that hope of his? Simply that you left in his hands this patronage. He was made to believe that the American people would follow that. He was made to believe that they would give up the cause for which they had been struggling for six years, the cause in which they had poured out so much blood and sacrificed so much life, rather than to give up those emoluments which, by your enactments and not by his, are attached to these several offices.

I say this; I think I am warranted in saying it by the very logic of every thing that transpired during that canvass. You know that one of his Cabinet ministers was said to have proclaimed during the last session of Congress that no man could partake of the President's bread and butter unless he would support the President's policy; and I cut yesterday from a paper of my own State a letter purporting to have been written by a gentleman I know very well, a resident of Wisconsin, a very able man, a very adroit politician, written on the 24th of February last, which, as it contains a more explicit statement of this policy and this reasoning than I can frame in the course of my remarks, I beg leave to produce.

It is dated Milwaukee, February 24, 1866, and is as follows:

"MY DEAR SIR: Inclosed please find check on New York for thirty dollars, the amount of one thousand copies of your great speech. Mr. Sholes and myself have sent them thoroughly over the State.

"The veto [of the Freedmen's Bureau bill] is popular here. The ratification meeting was a most decided success. I like the speech of the President on the 22d. It is straightforward and to the point. The people can understand it, and it explains some things that might before have seemed mysterious to them. I inclose you a slip from the paper of the postmaster at Whitewater. How long is this state of things to last? Are you and the President to be hunted down by your own officials? My advice is that a few—say only two or three—removals take place in this State just to show that lightning can strike. In every instance the places should be filled by men who have honorably served in the war and who voted for Lincoln and Johnson."

Offices were not to be given to those who supported the President's policy, but to be given to those who would leave the Republican party and go over to the other party to support the President's policy.

"A little of this kind of medicine now and considerable more of it before the first of September will unseat HOWE certain, and make COBB, PAINE, SAWYER, and McINDOE's condition precarious. This State next fall will go for Johnson by from fifteen to twenty thousand, if matters are only managed judiciously, and much of this depends upon the action of the Administration in defending itself.

Yours truly, J. A. NOONAN.
Hon. J. R. DOOLITTLE, Washington.

Now, Mr. President, it is no answer to say that these friends of the President or that the President himself was mistaken in his calculation. I know they were mistaken; I knew well enough they would be mistaken; but the fact that such calculations can be based upon this employment of the patronage which you, and not the Constitution or the makers of the Constitution, put in his hands; the fact that such calculations can be based upon your action is enough to cause you to hesitate, to consider, and reverse what you have done heretofore; reverse the whole of it, and not part of it.

This whole enterprise was a plain violation of the Constitution. The Constitution declares that—

"All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives."

In defiance of that plain declaration of the instrument, you saw a President who thought he had more legislative power than all of you, and it was because, and only because, he had this patronage in his hands.

Mr. President, it is the purpose of this bill to restrict this power of removal; but when you assert the power to restrict it you affirm the power to destroy it. If the President has by the Constitution the power to remove one officer whom you have helped to make, he has power to remove every one of them, and you ought to acknowledge it and not attempt to restrict it. If he cannot remove the whole, he cannot remove any one without your permission; but when you affirm your power to take from him the right to remove one officer, you do in effect declare the right to take from him the power to remove any one and every one. Having asserted the power to restrict, I ask the American Senate, in the name of Heaven, why not destroy this power at once, put an end to it, to the whole of it?

I ask the Senate to destroy this power because it is only by destroying, not by restricting it, that you can accomplish any real good, and by destroying it you will return the American President to the sphere of labor and of duty assigned to him by the Constitution, and you will restore his subordinates to their manhood, of which they have not caught sight during their official terms.

The bill proposes, as I said, to restrict this power of removal. The bill proposes to deny to him the right to remove any one of the officers who have been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, except the heads of Departments. I ask you why except the heads of Departments? I have listened from the beginning of this discussion for a sound and sensible reason for this distinction. I am bound to say, and yet I wish to say it with the utmost respect for the great ability of those who have participated in the discussion, that I have been compelled to wait so far in vain. I have not heard a reason which has affected my understanding. Very likely the fault is in my understanding and not in the reasoning employed; but after all I must, out of justice to my Maker, insist that if you have good reasons, I have understanding enough to comprehend them when you fairly state them to me.

It was said, indeed it was said by my friend from Oregon, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] that we ought to leave the President so much authority as to remove the head of a Department out of respect to the presidential office. Why, sir, the earlier Presidents of the United States though they had this power did not exert it, and I never have understood that they fell short in the respect of the American people because they did not exert it. The later Presidents of the United States having no more power have exerted it, and I have not discovered that they have gained any in the respect of the American people because of it.

If it be so, that respect for the presidential office depends upon the patronage he has to distribute, your whole bill is a blunder, if it is not a crime. If you cannot entertain respect for an officer who cannot give you "bread and butter," for God's sake do not take any of this authority from the present President; he is the last one we can afford to strip of any of his titles to respect. We never had one that we could afford to detract from less. Reverse your action on this bill, pile up patronage in his hands, if you cannot respect a President without it. For myself, I know I will never respect a President of the United States, nor will the American people respect another President of the United States, until you turn him from the work which I called the other day the peddling of patronage, and turn him again to the discharge of his legitimate duties. Let us see once more an American President standing up as the first magistrate of the nation, doing justice, and commanding justice to be done, not as the organ of a party, but as the minister of a nation. Then I shall begin once more to respect the presidential office, never until that time. It is whispered that I shall have to wait a long time for that day. I shall have to wait until I find an American Legislature which will undo deliberately the work which the first American Legislature carelessly did, a work which they never would have done, and you know they never would, if they could have foreseen the consequences of their own action. When James Madison stood there and defended the provision to confer this power upon the President, you know he did not conceive that we should come to electing Presidents for no other purpose than to dispense patronage; you know he did not conceive that we should come to elect Presidents who would confer it for the express purpose of rewarding partisan political friends, and you know he said that whenever that was done it would constitute a ground for impeachment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If my friend will allow me, in answer to his imputation of knowledge to me that I do not possess, I wish to say a word. It appears from Mr. Madison's speeches and writings that he did contemplate the abuse of power on the part of the Chief Executive in every conceivable way, and he went so far as to point out how such abuses of power under such administrations of the laws should be prevented and punished. Therefore I think it unjust to Mr. Madison to say that he did not foresee that the Chief Executive might commit precisely the improprieties that are now laid against the President.

Mr. HOWE. My friend cavils with me about the employment of words. The possibility that a President might abuse this power he did foresee, because as my friend says he did, and as I said before, he did suggest the remedy. The remedy was, as I said, by impeachment, and he thought if that degenerate day ever did come in American politics, when the President should prostitute this patronage to the work of rewarding political partisan friends, we should have an American Congress brave enough and honest enough to remove him from office. The first day came long ago. We have seen the President for a long time doing that. The Congress which Mr. Madison supposed we should see has not yet made its advent. As yet we do not seem even to find a Congress which will withdraw from the President the authority of law to repeat these impeachable offenses.

Others said, I think my friend the Senator from Vermont said, that the President ought to have this power of removing the heads of Departments, because they were the confidential counselors and advisers of the President, and I think the Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] echoed that sentiment and enforced it. Sir, if you mean to say that the Constitution made them such, that the Constitution designed they should be the confidential counselors and advisers of the President, all I can do is to deny it. You might just as well assert that the Constitution designed they should be his sisters. There is not a line or a letter in the Constitution which indicates either.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It says they shall give him opinions when he asks for them.

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir; and because it says they shall give him opinions, I stand upon that very clause and say the Constitution never contemplated any such thing as you say ought to exist. If the makers of the Constitution had intended that the Secretary of State and of the Treasury should be the mere tools and the lackeys of the President, which your law makes them, instead of providing in that fundamental law that he might call on them for written opinions, the Constitution would have said that he should not call on them to black his boots nor to groom his horses. I am not sure but you will have to put that clause into the Constitution, if you mean to make the heads of your Departments occupy respectable positions for any great length of time. Do you find any statute authorizing the Senate to call on your Clerk for any information about the usages of the Senate? Did you ever see a by-law of a bank which said the stockholders or the directors might consult the cashier or demand his opinion about the management of the bank? You do not want such provisions as these for consulting men whose offices are held at your pleasure. The power of removal secures all this, and, unhappily for our country, it secures a great deal more than this which ought never to be secured.

Then, Mr. President, I do insist, not merely as a matter of law, as I said, but as a matter of fact, that the Constitution never designed to create these relations between the President and these heads of Departments. They are not there for any purpose of close and confidential communication or counsel with the President. They are there not as the tools of an Executive, but they were designed to stand there as ministers of the state. Will you not consent to place them in the character of ministers of state, clothe them with the prerogatives of ministers of state, and secure them the independence which every minister of state demands for the protection and for the welfare of the Republic?

The Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] argued that the Constitution charged the President with the duty of seeing that the laws were faithfully executed, and therefore that he must have this power of summary removal in order to secure a prompt obedience and cooperation on the part of his subordinates, that these heads of Departments were created for the purpose of aiding him in the execution of the laws, and unless he was clothed with this power of summary removal they might become refractory and refuse to give him that prompt aid which he demanded. Why, Mr. President, a Secretary of the Treasury is no more an aid to the President in executing the laws than is the collector of customs in New York. The Postmaster General is no more an aid to the President in executing the laws than is the deputy postmaster at the confederate Cross-roads. I am not entirely sure, though, that he is a real functionary of the Government.

Mr. BROWN. He has not been confirmed yet. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOWE. My friend says he has not been confirmed yet. I had come to think of him as a real character, and to respect him very much as I respect all the rest of the office-holders. The Postmaster General, I say, is no more aid to the President in executing the laws than is every deputy postmaster. And if it be necessary that the President should have this power of summary removal to secure prompt obedience, then you ought to give him this power not merely over the principal officers, but you ought to give him this power over all the officers. You ought not to concur with the House in the amendment they have made; and you ought to rescind the bill you have enacted, reconsider the vote which you have taken, and leave this power in the hands of the President over every one of these offices. But I stand here to deny that any such power is necessary. I stand here to deny that that power is ever exerted for any such purpose. No, I will not go so far as to deny that it is ever exerted for that purpose. Some men may have been removed, undoubtedly have been removed, from office for a neglect of duty; but while one officer has been removed for neglect of duty a thousand and ten thousand faithful men have been removed from office who had neglected no duty in the world. This power of summary removal is not employed for the purpose of regulating official conduct; it is employed and used—the Senate, the American people, the world, God knows—for the purpose of regulating official opinion.

Mr. President, you do not clothe the general in the field with the power summarily to dismiss from his commission any subordinate of his. Is it not as essential to the success of the battle that the general should have prompt obedience on the part of every one of his subordinates as it is that the President should have thus prompt obedience on the part of his subordinates? No man will deny it. Why do you clothe the President with this most extraordinary and monstrous demoralizing power, and withhold it from the general intrusted with the fate of armies as well as of nations, and who needs it so much more? That is not the reason why the power is given to him. It is not the purpose for which it is employed.

Mr. President, in many of the States, in the State in which I live, I believe that every officer of the State, with the exception of notaries public, is elected by the people of the State or by the people of the locality, elected for a specified term, and during that term he cannot be dismissed from that employment except upon a sort of impeachment, not an impeachment before the Senate, but an impeachment before the Executive of the State, just such an impeachment as your bill provides for leaving in the hands of the President of the United States, and which is abundant for the purpose of securing official good conduct.

It was intimated the other day, if not asserted, that this amendment of the House of Representatives was pressed upon us, it was intimated that I pressed it, because of the present anomalous condition of affairs, and I was reminded that it might not always be so, that it was not reasonable to suppose that the present President of the United States would always be President. I said then, and I wish to repeat now, that my advocacy of this provision is not grounded at all upon the fact that I do not accord with the policy or the conduct of the present President of the United States. Let who may be President, I should still say this was the true rule; I should still say you could not have the best and most efficient public service while political opinions instead of public service is the criterion of fitness for office. Our present position is indeed peculiar. The President is of one way of thinking, the Senate is of another way of thinking; but suppose that in 1868, as no doubt will be the case, the American people shall put into the presidential chair a man in accord with you. The President then elected, although he will have in the statute the authority to remove summarily without the consent of the Senate, will never do it, and you know it. Practically he will not have the power; nominally he will. A President whose friends control the Senate will never undertake to remove an officer without the consent of the Senate. It never is done where the President and the Senate are in accord with each other. When, therefore, you get, as you will, a President in harmony with the American Congress, and in harmony with the American people, this statutory power, for which the Senator from Vermont contends, will be of no practical use whatever, because it will not be exercised.

But suppose, against all rational probabilities, that at the election of 1868, 1872, or 1876—I think that it is best to postpone it a great while—suppose that in the course of time the condition of parties should be reversed, and suppose it should happen that the Senator from Vermont should find a Senate here opposed to him and a President in harmony with him. Then perhaps he thinks he would like to have a President for partisan purposes clothed with this power of summary removal. If he thinks so, I think he is mistaken.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think so.

Mr. HOWE. I am glad to hear him disavow that opinion. When that time comes that power of removal in the hands of the President will not be worth a fig to any party, because whenever your enemies, whenever those gallant gentlemen who now occupy seats on the other side of this Chamber, shall be secured possession of the Government, shall be reinforced by members which shall enable them to make laws and to confirm appointments, you will find them actuated by a spirit very different from what seems to actuate us. The power to remove an officer is worth nothing to any party unless it is accompanied by the power to fill the place with the man you want, with a better man. Sir, I do not speak from the spirit of prophecy: I am instructed by history. In 1860 we elected a man who was in accord with us, but we had not a Congress in accord with him. Such a Congress was secured by secession, not by election. Suppose those gentlemen who left the Senate of the United States to enter into the service of the confederacy had seen fit to stay here, do you think President Lincoln could have removed a Democrat from office and appointed a Republican? Let me remind the Senate of what the present President of the United States thought was the duty of his party friends on just such an occasion. He was in that Senate: he voted against the election of Mr. Lincoln; he appealed to his party friends not to leave the American Senate, to fight their battles inside the Senate and inside the Constitution, inside the Union, as he called it. He exhorted them by every consideration which ought to have been addressed to them, and, as I think, by a great many considerations which never ought to have been addressed to them. But one of the arguments he presented was this; he said to them:

"I am for abiding by the Constitution; and in abiding by it I want to maintain and retain my place here, and put down Mr. Lincoln, and drive back his advances upon southern institutions, if he designs to make any. Have we not got the brakes in our hands? Have we not got the power? We have. Let South Carolina send her Senators back; let all the Senators come; and on the 4th of March next we shall have a majority of six in this body against him. This successful sectional candidate, who is in a minority of a million, or nearly so, on the popular vote, cannot make his Cabinet on the 4th of March next unless this Senate will permit him."

"Am I to be so great a coward as to retreat from duty? I will stand here and meet the encroachments upon the institutions of my country at the threshold; and as a man, as one that loves my country and my constituents, I will stand here and resist all encroachments and advances. Here is the place to stand. Shall I desert the citadel and let the enemy come in and take possession? No. Can Mr. Lincoln send a foreign minister or even a consul abroad unless he receives the sanction of the Senate? Can he appoint a postmaster whose salary is over a thousand dollars a year without the consent of the Senate? Shall we desert our posts, shrink from our responsibilities, and permit Mr. Lincoln to come with his cohorts, as we consider them, from the North, to carry off every thing? Are we so cowardly that, now that we are defeated, not conquered, we shall do this?"

That was the advice addressed to the Senate of 1861 by the present President of the United States, and you are admonished by that that whenever those gentlemen got possession of the Senate it is of no consequence that you have a friend of yours in the executive chair; he will be powerless to displace your enemies or to reward your friends. I do not deprecate that. I do not think any the worse of those gentlemen, because I know that would be their policy. I am glad to know of them that whenever they do get the reins in their hands they will have courage enough to drive the team. I want to see so much courage displayed by those who have the reins in their hands now.

Mr. President, I invoke the Senate to agree to this amendment of the House of Representatives. It will restore the President of the United States to the sphere of duty assigned to him by the Constitution; it will restore his subordinates to the official labors for which they were employed. It will transform the American people, that portion of them who need the transformation, from a race of office-seekers to a race of men. It will restore the public service to what it ought to be. By every consideration, it seems to me, which could move a Legislature we are exhorted to agree to that amendment of the House of Representatives.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, the particular question before the Senate is upon the amendment to this bill proposed by the House of Representatives. The bill as it passed the Senate excepted from its operation the Cabinet ministers. That exception the House have stricken out, and the question before the Senate is whether we will sanction that change.

I do not know that the question which my friend from Wisconsin has so elaborately discussed in the view that he takes of this measure is to be considered as before the Senate on this particular amendment. The bill as it passed the Senate rather affirmed the power of Congress to take from the President the authority to remove without the sanction of the Senate officers generally, and in excepting, therefore, the particular officers who are named in the exception it is to be considered that a majority of the Senate were under the impression that the President has not that power. The question of power I have already discussed in the previous debate, and I said perhaps all that I had to say on the subject; but in that discussion I said that the question might have been presented for judicial determination when General Jackson directed the deposits to be removed from the United States Bank, which he could only do by dismissing from office the particular officer to whom in the first instance he sent that direction.

Subsequently to the discussion which was had in the Senate in relation to the propriety of that removal, the Senate of the United States passed a resolution condemning General Jackson for usurping a power in that respect which, according to the view of the Senate, he did not possess. In that discussion, as I stated when the matter was before us formerly, it was conceded by those who contested the propriety of that action upon the part of the President that he had a right to remove the Secretary who refused to obey his orders in relation to the deposits. Mr. Justice Story, in his Commentaries, Mr. Chancellor Kent, and the Supreme Court in two cases to which I formerly referred, all considered the question of constitutional power as finally settled. I propose now upon that question merely to refer to a passage in the speech made by Mr. Webster in the Senate upon the protest of President Jackson in 1834:

"In the first place, then, I have to say, that I did not vote for the resolution on the mere ground of the removal of Mr. Duane from the office of Secretary of the Treasury. Although I disapprove of the removal altogether, yet the power of removal does exist in the President, according to the established construction of the Constitution; and therefore, although in a particular case it may be abused, and, in my opinion, was abused in this case, yet its exercise cannot be justly said to be an assumption or usurpation. We must all agree that Mr. Duane is out of office. He has, therefore, been removed by a power constitutionally competent to remove him, whatever may be thought of the exercise of that power under the circumstances of the case."

In addition, therefore, to the authority of Story and of Kent and of the Supreme Court of the United States, we have the authority of Mr. Webster that the constitutional question is to be considered as practically settled. My friend from Wisconsin proposes now to open that question, to change what has been the settled opinion of the country, if we may judge from the continuing acquiescence in the exercise of that power, and to place ourselves in the condition in which we stood in 1789, when the matter became a subject of debate in this branch of Congress and in the other branch. Is nothing to be settled? Are the decisions of the Supreme Court to be wholly disregarded? Is the action of every President of the United States from Washington down to the present incumbent in relation to the same subject to be also disregarded? If it is, we are virtually making another Constitution.

In this I have the authority of Mr. Madison. In a letter to Mr. Ingersoll of the 25th January, 1831, he said:

"Can it be of less consequence that the meaning of a constitution should be fixed and known, than that the meaning of a law should be so? Can, indeed, a law be fixed in its meaning and operation unless the constitution be so? On the contrary, if a particular Legislature, differing in the construction of the constitution from a series of preceding constructions, proceed to act on that difference, they not only introduce uncertainty and instability in the constitution, but in the laws themselves; inasmuch as all laws preceding the new construction and inconsistent with it are not only annulled for the future, but virtually pronounced nullities from the beginning."

"Let it, then, be left to the decision of every intelligent and candid judge, which on the whole is most to be relied on for the true and safe construction of a constitution that which has the uniform sanction of successive legislative bodies through a period of years and under the varied ascendancy of parties; or that which depends upon the opinions of every new Legislature, heated as it may be by the spirit of party, eager in the pursuit of some favorite object, or led astray by the eloquence and address of popular statesmen, themselves perhaps under the influence of the same misleading causes."

So much in relation to the power. Now, supposing the power to exist which this bill assumes, as I said just now, the next question is whether it should be exerted as against the particular officers who are named within the exception, Cabinet officers. Why are they appointed, and why are they named Cabinet officers? They are appointed for the purpose of aiding the President in his official duties. They are not appointed, nor would the people of the United States consent to have them so appointed, for the purpose of thwarting the President of the United States in what he might consider was the duty incumbent upon him as President. He has very high powers, and he is false to himself if he refuses to exert them. He has very important and high duties, and he is equally false to himself if he disregards them. But how is he to exercise the powers with which he is unquestionably vested, and perform the duties which the Constitution imposes upon him, if he is to have around him not persons as friends and agreeing in the general scope of his policy, but men not subject to his control, and who may have a policy of their own entirely at war with that which he and the people of the United States may suppose to be the true policy of the country?

The honorable member can gain, as I think, no support in the way of argument for the proposition of the House because of the particular condition in which the President stands now to the party that elected him. Suppose that unfortunate and calamitous event had not happened, the assassination of President Lincoln, and he had discovered that he had a Cabinet around him upon whom he could not place reliance; that his Secretary of the Treasury, for instance, was pursuing a policy at war with what he believed to be the true policy of that Department, and so in relation to the other Departments; that the Secretary of State, in whose hands are placed the management of the concerns of the Government with foreign nations, was adopting a course inimical in his opinion to the true interest of the United States and injurious to their reputation; is he to be told "they shall retain their seats in spite of you unless we consent to their removal?"

The time was, and that time was at the period of General Jackson's protest, to which I have alluded, when an excitement arose in the country that affected the very existence of this body. The papers of the day that supported General Jackson and General Jackson's policy were crying out from day to day, "Look to the Senate, the aristocratic branch of the Government, the branch that is seeking to usurp to itself all power." At one time, judging from those signs, it was by no means certain that the tenure of office of the Senators of the United States might not be at some future day and at an early day changed. The President of the United States then was said to be the representative of the people, fresh from them, and therefore better able to know their will than anybody to be found in this Chamber. It was said that the very high and important duties which were devolved upon him by the Constitution required that he should at early periods go before the people and account to them for the manner in which he had discharged his trust, if he thought proper to ask for a reelection, and his policy in advance, his character in advance, his faithfulness to the institutions of the country in advance, are supposed to be known before he is elected to the Presidency; and when the Senate of the United States, by the course which they pursued in relation to the deposits, denounced him, the voice of the country far and wide was heard speaking loudly in condemnation of this body, and speaking so loudly in its condemnation that it threatened to affect even its existence.

Now, what is it proposed to do? To say, not to the present incumbent of the office, not to anybody who may become an incumbent of the office by the death or removal from office of the President elected as President by the people, but that he who may be elected President by the people, who may have been mistaken in relation to the character or the ability of the men whom he had selected to advise him, shall not have the power of changing them and obtaining others.

It has been said with truth, from the beginning of the Government, that there is to be found and has been found in almost every Cabinet one or more aspirants for the Presidency, and that their duties have been fashioned in a way that they thought would be calculated to gratify that aspiration. That condition of things will exist hereafter if it does not exist now. The President, by the power that he has to remove, has the means by which he can keep such an aspirant within proper limits; but declare that he shall not have the power to remove him, and you have virtually a President in anticipation warring with the President that is in office. That will not be concord, which is the very character the Cabinet relation assumes is to result as between the President and the Cabinet, but just as many wills and as many policies, if there can be as many policies, different from those of the President as the Cabinet ministers themselves number numerically.

I do not know what may be the fate of the amendment upon which the Senate is now called upon to vote. It was defeated when proposed by my friend from Wisconsin before the bill went to the House, by a vote, I think, of 27 to 15; but this I know: I think I know, and knowing it therefore I will predict it, that if it passes, the next Congress that may be elected after the next presidential election, if it contains a majority in each branch friendly to the President elected, will repeal it.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator from Maryland, upon the question of whether this power is derived from the Constitution or not, does not give us the benefit of his opinion. He knows the Constitution, for he has read it a great many times and for a great many years. If the power is in the Constitution he is the very man who could show it even to me; but instead of telling me where this curious power sleeps in the Constitution he contents himself with referring me to the casual declarations of this or that man who has gone before, and who seemed to admit that the power was in the Constitution.

I have said, and now repeat, that this power is the creature of the statute and not of the Constitution. I have read the statute which gives the power, which has continued the law; and although Mr. Webster said or intimated, in the language which has been read here, that that had been construed to be the constitutional power of the President, I must say I think Mr. Webster spoke without due consideration of that particular point, because if Mr. Webster had meant to say that the Constitution conferred that power he knew as well as any man who ever spoke the English language how to say it, and if he thought that power was in the Constitution he knew as well as any man who ever read it where the power was, and he would not have referred us to the act of 1789 as the evidence that that power was in the Constitution, but would have referred us to the Constitution itself.

But the Senator from Maryland argues this question with his usual adroitness, and having stated the opinion of Webster upon this point, and assuming that that settles the case that the Constitution confers the power, he asks us if nothing is to be considered as settled. I will not reply to that question put by the Senator from Maryland. I prefer to consider that question with my friends on this side of the Chamber; I am talking to them; and they say that that is not settled; their bill denies that the Constitution confers this power on the President, and they deny by their bill that the President ought to have this power. It is to them I am talking.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is true that, in what I have said to-day, I did not undertake to show that the true construction of the Constitution, in my opinion, was that the power exists by any reasoning of my own. I did undertake what I considered a very unnecessary duty, and one that arrogated to myself more ability in such matters than I know I possess, when the subject was before the Senate upon a former occasion. All that I have done to-day is to refer to Mr. Madison, to Mr. Justice Story, to Kent, and to Webster; and when I referred to Mr. Madison the honorable member from Wisconsin and the Senate, I suppose, recollect that he did attempt to satisfy the House of which he was a member that the power existed, and he succeeded. I have not the vanity to suppose that I could add anything to the reasoning of that distinguished statesman. And whatever ability my friend from Wisconsin may possess which, if exerted, will enable him to shake the authority of Madison, I should despair if I attempted by any effort of my own to support that authority. The whole argument was exhausted, and he not only considered the question at that time and successfully aided in getting the construction of the Constitution, which is inconsistent with the provisions of this bill, maintained, but in after life, after the cares of office had ceased, after he was in his retirement at his home in Virginia, he wrote one or two letters full of argument on the same subject, in which he not only maintained the existence of the power, but said in relation to an article in the Federalist written by Mr. Hamilton, which averred that the power could be exercised as was supposed only with the concurrence of the Senate, that if he so meant to be understood in that passage of that article he had afterward changed his opinion. All that I got up to say now was that I am perfectly satisfied to stand, for the opinion which I have upon this subject, upon the arguments of Mr. Madison and the other great authorities to which I referred.

Mr. HOWE. I assent to much that the Senator from Maryland has now said. Taking the same side of the question I do not insist that the Senator from Maryland could add anything to the argument of Mr. Madison on the question whether the Constitution conferred this power on the President or not. I concede that Mr. Madison said everything on that side of the question that could be said. I only insist that the Senator from Maryland, if he would lend himself to the labor, could undo the argument which Mr. Madison submitted, and in a very short space of time. But the bill, I repeat, and I repeat it for the benefit of my friends on this side of the House, denies this power to the President as derived from the Constitution. It is to them I address myself when I urge them to perfect the reform which the bill but just inaugurates.

But the Senator from Maryland has thrown out one or two suggestions why, whether this power is conferred on the President or not by the Constitution, he thinks he ought to have it; and the first is, that those heads of Departments, he repeats again, are the confidential advisers of the President. He will repeat that, if he is not careful, so many times that he will get to believing in it. It has been my purpose in this debate to show that no such thing was designed; that there is nothing in the Constitution which intimates it, nothing in the character of these offices which indicates it.

But he supposes, nay he asserts, that there have always been in the Cabinet aspirants for the Presidency. Well, of what benefit is this authority to summarily remove them in that respect? They have been there, if at all, in spite of that authority, for the President has always had it in his power to remove them, and yet he has never cleared them out. They have been there in spite of the authority. Remove the authority and they cannot be any more than there. But aspirants for the Presidency may just as well be in the Cabinet as in the Congress, may just as well be in the Cabinet or in the Congress either, as among the people. If they are aspirants for the Presidency and they expect the Presidency to be conferred upon them by the American people, I infer, if they are not stupid aspirants, as sometimes happens to be the case, they will be all the more laborious to promote the public welfare. If that be the fact, I do not assume that that will unfit them for members of the Cabinet; I assume that they will only be all the more fitted.

But, Mr. President, the Senator tells us that it may so happen that each one of these aspirants for the Presidency may have a policy of his own, and that there may be as many policies in the Cabinet as there may be individuals in the Cabinet. Sir, I want to stand here simply to say to the Senate that there should be but one policy in any Cabinet, and that should be the policy prescribed to both President and Cabinet by the law-making tribunal of the United States. No head of an executive department has any business with a policy; nor has the President any business with a policy. He has a duty to discharge. His duty is to execute, not his own will, but the American will, and to derive that will from American law as spoken by the American Legislature.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I do not intend to enter into a full discussion of the important question before the Senate. I will only say that the long practice of the Government and the opinions expressed by the great men who have preceded us, of all political parties and under all circumstances, have settled, if any doubtful construction of the Constitution can be settled, this question already. But, sir, I shall not go into an argument upon the construction of the language of the Constitution. If it were presented to me as an original question, the opinions of Mr. Webster, Mr. Madison, Mr. Justice Story, Chancellor Kent, and the action of political parties and the men of those parties have passed upon that question and given a construction for seventy years. The opinion of Mr. Webster, perhaps, is entitled to the greater weight, because at the time it was given he was the leading champion of the party in opposition to the President during the administration of General Jackson, and therefore if any party bias could operate upon Mr. Webster it would have operated upon him at that time. But as a great constitutional lawyer, rising above all the bias of party excitement, he gave his deliberate opinion that this constitutional question, which in the first place might have been a doubtful question, had been settled by the action of the Government and by the decisions of judges and legislators.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to inquire of my friend whether in 1863, in this body, he did not vote for a law in the national bank act which expressly provided that the Comptroller of the Currency should be removable by the President only by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and whether there was not a general concurrence at that time, when it involved no political consideration, in the propriety of such legislation?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I did vote for the general bank law, although my convictions were not satisfied as to all its provisions. It was a thing regarded as necessary in the then existing state of the country and I gave it my support.

Sir, whatever may be said of the other officers of the Government who are embraced within the provisions of this bill, I think certainly the committee who reported it acted wisely in making the exception which has been here made of the heads of Departments. These heads of Departments stand in a peculiar relation to the President as his confidential advisers, from whom, by the very terms of the Constitution itself, he may demand an opinion in writing upon every important question which may arise in the administration of affairs. They are in the relation to him of private confidential advisers and secretaries, to enable him to execute the laws; and it is essential to the true administration of the laws that the Cabinet should be united and harmonious. If any mistake has arisen in the administration of affairs, either during the administration of Mr. Lincoln or the administration of Mr. Johnson, in my judgment, it is more to be attributed to the fact that Mr. Lincoln did not have a Cabinet united and harmonious which he could call into confidential consultation with him upon the great questions presented to him in the course of his Administration; and the same mistake has undoubtedly arisen more or less in the administration of Mr. Johnson. It is essential to a proper administration, in my opinion, that the Cabinet should be united and should be harmonious.

But, sir, I probably should not have arisen at all if it were not for the fact that my colleague has thought proper, in the course of his speech, to read a letter, said to have been published in the newspapers, addressed to me. This letter is a private letter, which, by some means or other, has been purloined from among my private papers. I have never given any authority for its publication. I do not say that my colleague was aware of that fact, for had he been aware of it I presume he never would have used the letter. Having been obtained under those circumstances, I acquit him as a matter of course of all impropriety in the use of the letter which has been published. But, sir, in relation to the letter itself, I have felt it due to the gentleman who addressed it to me to state this fact, that it was not published with my consent, but was purloined from my private papers by some person unknown to me.

This letter contained a slip cut from a newspaper published by an editor residing at White-water, in the State of Wisconsin, who was the postmaster of that place; and it will be observed that all that is contained in the letter has reference to the course which was pursued by certain gentlemen residing in the State of Wisconsin, holding office under the Administration, and who were open-mouthed and most bitter in their denunciations personally against myself and against the President; and the writer of the letter suggests, how long shall this be endured, that the President and yourself are to be thus calumniated and maligned?

I shall not go into any further discussion of this question at the present time. My colleague, in the course of his remarks, seemed to concede that it was perfectly proper, in the changes of political parties, that when a party came into power it should nominate its friends to office. He claimed, however, that President Johnson has deserted the principles of the party which elected him to power, and has made removals because he intended to compel his friends who were associated with him to desert their principles also.

Sir, into this question as to who has deserted the principles of the party which elected Mr. Lincoln and Mr. Johnson to power in 1864 I shall not enter now. I only say to my colleague that while I concede to him all sincerity, for I do not question the sincerity of his motives, I know that so far as I am concerned I have not changed any of the principles which I have advocated on this floor, nor have I been false to a pledge which was ever given by myself or the party which I aided in elevating to power. The change is in himself. There are gentlemen upon this floor who have not changed. I see the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] and the honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. BROWN] and the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] and other Senators that I could name. They stand now where they stood two years ago. I stand now where I stood two years ago. I was battling them then and over precisely the same question upon which I am battling them now. They have not changed, nor have I; but my colleague has advanced from the position where he stood side by side with me, and taken his position by the side of the Senator from Massachusetts. I question not his sincerity. If his convictions lead him there it is well. I question the sincerity of no other man. But whether he has changed in his position or I have changed, whether he has deserted the party and the principles upon which the party came into power in 1864, or whether I have deserted them, is a question which he and I can settle at another time.

For myself I am prepared to show, at all events I believe I can show, that I stand where I stood in 1864. This question of reconstruction was a question in discussion, it is true, in 1864. It was the very question upon which a portion of the Republican party called together a convention at Cleveland, because they were dissatisfied with the Administration and the policy of Mr. Lincoln. It is a question upon which there has been controversy in the Republican party from that day down to the present time. Upon that question I admit I took one side; the Senator from Massachusetts and some others took another. And I admit also that many Senators who stood with me then have become satisfied for some reason to advance and take position by the side of the Senator from Massachusetts. I do not find any fault if their convictions lead them there. But what I do say is, that because I have not advanced with them from my position to take another they have no right to condemn me as having deserted the positions which I occupied then and still occupy.

But, sir, I shall not go into that question on this occasion. I rose more to say in justice to the gentleman from whom the alleged letter was written that it was purloined from my private papers by some person unknown to me, and has been published without my consent. My colleague is now in his seat. As I stated before, I acquit him entirely of any knowledge on that subject, for I do not believe, had he known the manner in which it was taken, he would have used the letter in the Senate of the United States.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President—

Mr. DIXON. With the consent of the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, before he proceeds I desire to submit an amendment which I intend to propose to the resolution of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] to amend the Constitution, when it shall come up. I desire to have the following inserted as a preamble:

Whereas at the first session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress an amendment to the Constitution of the United States was proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, which said amendment has not been ratified by the States in which rebellion against the United States recently prevailed; and whereas there is reason to believe that the following amendment to the Constitution of the United States would, if proposed by Congress, be ratified by the Legislatures of said States; and whereas there is also reason to believe that the constitutions of said States will soon be amended by the voluntary action of the Legislatures and people thereof by the adoption of an article in substance as follows, namely:

"ARTICLE.—Every male citizen who has resided in this State for one year, and in the county in which he offers to vote six months immediately preceding the day of election, and can read the Constitution of the United States in the English language, and can write his own name, or may be the owner of $250 worth of taxable property, shall be entitled to vote at any election for Governor of the State, members of the Legislature, and all other officers elected by the people of the State: Provided, That no person by reason of this article shall be excluded from voting who has heretofore exercised the elective franchise under the constitution or laws of this State, or who at the time of the adoption of this amendment may be entitled to vote undersaid constitution and laws."

Now, therefore, in view of the above considerations and in the confident hope of an early fraternal restoration of the Union: Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c.

Then comes the resolution, and I propose to add to it this additional article:

ARTICLE.—

SEC. 1. The Union under the Constitution is and shall be perpetual. No State shall pass any law or ordinance to secede or withdraw from the Union, and any such law or ordinance shall be null and void.

SEC. 2. The public debt of the United States, authorized by law, shall ever be held sacred and inviolate, but neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the Government or authority of the United States.

SEC. 3. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the States in which they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

SEC. 4. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State excluding Indians not taxed. But when any State shall, on account of race or color, or previous condition of servitude, exclude from voting at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, members of the Legislature, and other officers elected by the people, any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age and citizens of the United States, then the entire class of persons so excluded from the elective franchise shall not be counted in the basis of representation. And no State shall require as a property qualification for voters more than the value of $20 of taxable property, nor as an educational qualification more education than enough to enable the voter to read the Constitution of the United States in the English language and write his own name.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I do not propose to enter again into the general debate upon this bill; I spoke on a former occasion at length; but I desire to say something in answer to the Senator from Wisconsin who spoke this morning, [Mr. HOWE.]

The Senator from Wisconsin suggested a point which was made in the great debate on the subject of removals from office in the Congress of 1789, to wit, that the Constitution has made no provision and contains no grant of power upon that subject except in the clauses which relate to impeachment. I say that suggestion was made in that debate, and it received complete consideration from the several members of the House of Representatives who took part in the discussion. If ever there was a point or a suggestion triumphantly met and answered it was this. The debate which went on for nearly one month in the House of Representatives at various times touched this point. The debate upon it was exhaustive. Inasmuch as the Senator from Wisconsin, however, has introduced it now for the first time in the debate upon this measure, I choose to read from the old record of debates an important passage which will dispose of the Senator's argument, at least so far as it is founded upon former authority. About the close of the debate of 1789 Mr. Madison, in replying to his colleague, Mr. Page, said:

"I have a great respect for the abilities and judgment of my worthy colleague, (Mr. Page), and am convinced he is inspired by the purest motives in his opposition to what he conceives to be an improper measure; but I hope he will not think so strange of our difference if he considers the small proportion of the House which concurs with him with respect to impeachment being the only way of removing officers. I believe the opinion is held but by one gentleman besides himself. If this sentiment were to obtain, it would give rise to more objections to the Constitution than gentlemen are aware of; more than any other construction whatever."

In a House consisting of between fifty and sixty members, after a month's exhaustive consideration of this whole subject of removals, there were only two members left who entertained any such opinion as that which has now been introduced into this debate by the Senator from Wisconsin. In view of this it will not be necessary for me to go over the argument again; to restate those considerations and arguments which had so complete and decisive an effect upon the House of Representatives at the time mentioned.

Why, Mr. President, that very clause of the Constitution which provides that judges of the Supreme Court shall not be removed, or, in other words, provides that they shall hold their offices during good behavior, is itself decisive against any pretense of argument founded upon the impeachment clauses; because when the Constitution provides in effect that these particular officers shall not be subject to removal except by impeachment the conclusion is irresistible that other officers, both those enumerated in the Constitution and those subordinate ones which may be established by law, will be subject to such power. If this were not so that provision which fixes tenure during good behavior to the judicial office would be a provision nonsensical and absurd.

But what I rose for principally was to supply an omission in my former argument on this subject. During the former debate the Senator from Oregon [Mr. WILLIAMS] made the statement in unqualified terms that Mr. Madison had declared, with the acquiescence of the men of his age or of his time, that for an abuse by the President of his power of removing from office he would be liable to impeachment by the House of Representatives, and to trial and sentence of degradation or removal from office by the Senate. He repeated this from a speech of a colleague of mine in the House of Representatives, a very able member who spoke upon removals from office at the present session, and alluded to this declaration of Mr. Madison, made in 1789. There is reason for care and for caution in the Senate in discussing questions connected with impeachment, in discussing questions of law connected with that great subject. I regret that the Senator from Oregon introduced this point into the debate; and I regretted also to hear the Senator from Wisconsin this morning speak with some degree of earnestness and at some length upon the same point. As, however, this matter is before us, and as our debates go to the country and opinions are formed upon them, I shall do what I think to be my duty: I shall bring before the Senate the record of the old debate so far as this point was concerned, and without argument of my own submit that record to public judgment.

In the first place, I will read what Mr. Madison did say:

"What will be the motives which the President can feel for such abuse of his power and the restraints that operate to prevent it? In the first place, he will be impeachable by this House before the Senate for such an act of maladministration; for I contend that the wanton removal of meritorious officers would subject him to impeachment and removal from his own high trust."

This was in the midst of the debate, and was an observation obviously thrown off in the heat of argument. It was taken up and answered by Mr. Gerry promptly and strongly. He said:

"It is said that the President will be subject to an impeachment for dismissing a good man. This, in my mind, involves an absurdity. How can the House impeach the President for doing an act which the Legislature has submitted to his discretion?"

Of course if the submission of the question of removal be by the Constitution itself the same observation would apply. He was speaking, however, upon a clause of the bill which in form conferred the power on the President to remove.

Again, Mr. Gerry said later in the debate, and when he spoke with great deliberation and power:

"How can you impeach the President, as was said by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MADISON], for exercising a power vested in him by law? Sir, it is an absurdity to talk of impeachment on such occasions when the officer is shielded by the law."

I read again from Mr. Benson:

"But it is supposed that the President may be impeached for an abuse of this power. How can that event take place? He will tell you he thought it incumbent on him to displace the officer, because he apprehended the public tranquility was in danger; and if he erred it was the error of the head not of the heart. And will any House of Representatives ever be found to impeach the Chief Magistrate of the United States for an error in opinion?"

I confine myself to a few pertinent extracts to show the current of the debate, but propose to add one remark: that although Mr. Madison participated frequently in the debate after he first spoke, and although he noticed every argument which had been advanced by the opposition against his views; although he exhausted the subject with a fullness and with a power that has few examples in argument in our legislative history, he never recurred to this point. He seems to have dropped it, to have taken the answers which were made by Mr. Gerry and by other gentlemen as decisive. He nowhere restates or attempts to vindicate his former observations on impeachment.

I have read so much from the record of this debate in order that the impression shall not go forth to the public that the Senate is committing itself, without propriety, in advance of any necessity or reason whatever to any particular opinion upon the law of impeachment; and I conceive that this is an act of duty to the Senate and to the public, inasmuch as this subject has been brought forward by others. This was my purpose in rising, and I have accomplished it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not desire to enter into any debate on the general question of the power of Congress to regulate the tenure of office. I have already shown by my votes that I am of the opinion that Congress has the power to regulate the tenure of office and legislate in regard to removals from office. The Constitution does not in express terms confer upon any one the power of removal from office. The President has power to appoint to office, and the Senate has power to advise and consent to his appointments; but no express power is given to the President to remove persons from office. This power must necessarily exist in some department of the Government, and it was very natural at the beginning of the Government that the power should be exercised by the President, and that that should be acquiesced in from time to time. All that can be said about it is that the different departments of the Government have acquiesced in the exercise of the power by the President; but I think it has never been successfully denied that Congress may regulate the power of removal, as it may very many other functions of the Executive. As this bill is based upon the right of Congress to legislate in controlling and regulating the power of removal, I have no doubt of the constitutional power of Congress to pass such a bill as this. Nor have I any doubt that Congress may include within the provisions of this bill the Cabinet officers. It is, therefore, with me, not a question of constitutional law, but a question of propriety; and the question resolves itself into this: will Congress by law prevent the President from having a Cabinet of his own choice?

If this amendment be made and the bill passes in that shape, the result will be that when a President goes out of office, the Cabinet officers of his predecessor will be continued; the incoming President will be compelled to go on with the same Cabinet officers, unless the Senate concur with him in their removal. Suppose that by a violent change of public opinion, as may often occur in this country, a President of the United States is elected who represents the great body of the people, and the Senate remain of the old opinions, the Senate being a very conservative body, very seldom changing, or changing only by slow degrees. Suppose the Senate should refuse to obey the voice of the people and allow a President selected by the people to have a Cabinet of his own choice through whom and by whom alone he could perform the functions of his office. Suppose that some Cabinet minister under the old Administration should hang on to his office. It is hardly a probable supposition, I admit, because I do not see how any gentlemen could do it, or how any man could hold an office of that kind against the will and wish of his chief; but yet if we adopt the amendment of the House, and pass the bill in that shape, we compel the President to retain in office a man who is required to perform executive functions under him against his will, simply because the law forbids him from removing such an officer, and because the incumbent has not courtesy enough or has not sufficient deference to the public will to retire from his office. In other words, we are called upon to legislate to continue a man in office against the will of the people and against the will of his own chief.

Mr. President, I am not prepared to cast such a vote. I have no doubt whatever that the Cabinet officers ought to retire with the President, and the Cabinet officers ought to have harmonious relations, personal and political, with the President of the United States. The executive office is a unit, and must necessarily be so. All the heads of Departments must conform to the wishes of the President in a great measure. He must have power and control over them. It is impossible to divide the executive authority. The same reasoning does not apply to the minor officers, because they are merely subordinate agents, and whether they agree with the President in political opinion or not is a matter of perfect indifference. In England when a change of administration occurs every member of the Cabinet, as a matter of course, tenders his resignation; new combinations and formations are made; but all the minor officers are retained. When there is a change of Cabinet ministry in England the subordinate offices are not affected.

If this bill is intended to prevent a wholesale removal of officers for political opinions I think it a wise measure and it ought to be supported; it ought to be voted for regardless of the political divisions that now separate the Senate from the President. It is a wise measure for all time. It ought to have been passed, and probably would have been passed long ago, if a similar condition of affairs had existed before. But when you propose to extend that principle to Cabinet officers a very different state of facts arises and different considerations apply to the subject.

Now, I say that if a Cabinet officer should attempt to hold his office for a moment beyond the time when he retains the entire confidence of the President I would not vote to retain him, nor would I compel a President to have about him in these high positions a man in whom he did not entirely trust, both personally and politically. It would be unwise to require him to administer the Government without agents of his own choosing.

It seems to me, therefore, that it would be unwise for the Senate to ingraft in this bill a provision that would enable a Cabinet officer to hold on to his office in violation of the will of his chief. No harm can result from leaving out such a clause, because if the President appoints an unfit man, sends his name to the Senate, the Senate can reject it. Suppose the personal relations between a Cabinet officer and the President become unpleasant so that they can have no social intercourse. The Senator from Wisconsin says in such a case as that the Cabinet officer would resign; but suppose he would not resign, suppose he should hold on to his power and to position, what then? There is nobody to remove him, no power to remove him; the President cannot remove him, and yet he can have no intercourse with him. Would you compel such a state of affairs? It seems to me that it would be unwise to do so.

There is no public exigency requiring such a rule. What is a Cabinet officer after all? The President's mere clerk, because, although these Cabinet officers are considered as high officers of the Government, they are the mere clerks or recording agents of the President, having scarcely any power except that which is given to them as a part of the executive authority. It seems to me that when there is any unpleasant relation, any unpleasant differences arising between the President and any one of these officers he ought to have the power to discharge him. I would as soon think of imposing upon the President a Private Secretary with whom he had no kindly relations, personal and political, as to impose upon him a Cabinet minister with whom his relations were not kind. If, however, he sees proper to remove any of these officers and undertakes to appoint an unfit man the Senate have ample power over the subject. If the name of a person is sent here that is not entirely acceptable to the Senate we have the power to reject him, and the President cannot fill the office until we are with him, so that there is no exigency that can arise for the passage of such a bill as this would be with the House amendment.

Therefore, while I am willing to regulate the tenure of office to prevent if possible the wholesale removal of officers at every change of the executive department, while I am willing by some strict law to keep in office men who have had experience and shown their fidelity, until they are removed for cause, I am not willing to extend that to the Cabinet ministers, from the very nature of whose office the power over them must be absolute. The power to separate the relations between them and the President must exist. Any gentleman fit to be a Cabinet minister, who receives an intimation from his chief that his longer continuance in that office is unpleasant to him, would necessarily resign. If he did not resign it would show that he was unfit to be there. I cannot imagine a case where a Cabinet officer would hold on to his place in defiance and against the wishes of his chief; and if such a case should occur I certainly would not by any extraordinary or ordinary legislation protect him in that office and enable him to hold on to the office in defiance of what would be regarded in every constitutional Government as the proper rule, namely, to retire when he separates or differs in opinion from his chief.

My friend from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] suggests to me a case: suppose the southern men had not gone but at the beginning of the war; they and their party would have had a majority in the Senate of the United States. Suppose Mr. Lincoln could not have removed the Cabinet ministers who were then around him, that they could hold their offices in spite of him, that there was no power in him to remove them. That is precisely the case that is here provided for. It is a case which might have actually occurred in that instance. But for the withdrawal of the southern members from their seats in the Senate Chamber the Senate under the operation of a bill like this could have compelled the new President, Mr. Lincoln, to administer this Government with the agents his predecessor had around him, some of whom not very long before had actually been conspiring against the Government they were sworn to support. This is a pretty strong statement, but it is a case that might have arisen.

Take the case that may arise at the end of the present Administration. Suppose the President at the end of his term should go out of office and the people of the United States should, as we hope they will, elect some man in whom they have entire confidence; would you by this law enable the Senate of the United States to keep in office all the present heads of Departments? My friend from Wisconsin will say oh! no; that is not a supposable case because the Senate is all right. But, sir, we are legislating for the future. It will not do for us to legislate merely for the condition of affairs that now surrounds us. The case may be different when all the States are represented and are back here, as they probably will be before the next presidential election, when they are all represented on this floor by two Senators from each State. Suppose then, under the operations of this law, the voice of the people should not be heard then, and the present Cabinet should be kept in power, Senators would feel that this law did not operate very well then.

There is no public exigency requiring an exercise of power like this; nor do I believe, although perhaps it is going out of the record, that this subject was so fully considered in the House of Representatives as to give to the small vote that concurred in the passage of this amendment the force that I am always willing to give to the judgment of a coordinate branch of the Government.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I shall not enter into the discussion of this question, but only say that I shall, under no circumstances, vote to prevent the President of the United States from removing a Cabinet officer at any time that he wishes to do so. In fact, in my judgment, had the President been true to himself and his real friends he would have renewed some of his present Cabinet long ago. I believe the President to be patriotic. He has proved himself so throughout his whole life. There has been no President in the last thirty years who has appointed one tenth part of the numbers of his enemies to office as President Johnson; and there has been no President in that period who has removed so few of his enemies from office.

But, sir, having said this much, I wish to state that my principal object in rising was to disclaim in behalf of the party to which I belong any approval of the proposed amendment to the Constitution offered by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE,] or the amendment thereto offered by the honorable Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. DIXON,] if, as I understand, it requires as condition to representation in Congress of any State the property qualification or the extension of suffrage to the negro race, which it seems to imply. Sir, I know what the judgment of the country will be, considering the intimate relations existing between the honorable Senator from Connecticut and the President of the United States; and that is, that that amendment will be considered an Administration measure. If so, I say for one—and I speak for the Democratic party of my State, and I think I can speak in behalf of one million eight hundred thousand Democrats in the non-seceding States—that that proposition will meet with no approval from them; and I trust in God that there is no southern State, however menaced by congressional authority, I had almost said congressional tyranny, that will so degrade itself or be so untrue and unfaithful to the friends who have stood up for their constitutional rights, as to adopt such a proposition as that. There is one State in this Union, although her electoral voice may not be very potential, that will never, under any circumstances, agree to it.

While I shall continue to support the President of the United States in all his constitutional rights and in every measure of public policy which I believe to be right in itself and conducive to the good of my country, I will not under any circumstances be so unfaithful to my own convictions of duty, to my fidelity to the principles of the great and glorious party to which I belong, as to countenance for a moment such a proposition as that.

I have said thus much in order, if possible, that the poison which has been thrown into this Chamber this morning may not have a too disastrous effect so far as my humble ability can prevent it; and having said thus much, I shall say no more, trusting to the fidelity of the party to which I belong, to its principles, that they shall not for a moment countenance the proposition of the honorable Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. CONNESS. I think this opportunity may not be allowed to pass without congratulating the country upon the prospect of the separation of the sheep from the goats. I will not say who are the sheep nor who are the goats. But I will add congratulation to the honorable Senator from Connecticut for the leave he has taken, after having strayed long from the right path, on his return to the fold. I think the prospect this morning is cheering and bright for the country. And in this connection I am very glad to hear the honorable Senator from Delaware say that, notwithstanding his emphatic dissent from the great proposition proposed this morning by the Senator from Connecticut, he will yet stand by the President in all that is right. With such a position from him as the leader of one party and such a proposition from the honorable Senator from Connecticut on the other side, I do not see but that the great passage that has yawned so deep and wide will be bridged over in due time, and that the country will be safe. Again I congratulate the Senator from Connecticut and the country.

Mr. DIXON. I suppose, then, I may count on the Senator's vote in favor of my amendment.

Mr. CONNESS. Unquestionably, after it shall be improved a little.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HENRICKS in the chair.) The question is on concurring in the amendment proposed by the House of Representatives to the bill.

Mr. SUMNER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, in the year 1840 I made a report, somewhat elaborate, on this whole subject of the power of appointment and removal to the House of Representatives. I there assumed the ground distinctly that in order to remove as well as appoint the concurrence of the whole appointing power was necessary, namely, the President and Senate. The converse of that proposition has been acted on from that time to the present, and I am not prepared to say now how far I would concede a modification of my former opinion by the subsequent practice and usage of the Government.

But, sir, in relation to members of the Cabinet, I hold that that is a subject which Congress has no power to legislate upon as regards their removal from office. The members of the Cabinet are not inferior officers in the sense of the Constitution, because the Constitution expressly provides that Congress by law may authorize the appointment of inferior officers of the Government by the heads of Departments. It would be an absurdity to say that the Constitution vested the appointment potentially of inferior officers of the Government in inferior officers of the Government; and when it by express language invests Congress with the power to give the appointment of inferior officers to the heads of Departments, it necessarily classifies the heads of Departments as superior officers of Government. As such they are appointed by the nomination of the President and the confirmation of the Senate.

The organized power to appoint the heads of the Departments is then a purely constitutional power. It is one that is organized by the Constitution, and it is to be exercised, according to my judgment, in conformity to the principle of the Constitution. If the Constitution permits the President to remove a head of a Department from office, Congress by its legislation has no power to shackle that power of the President to remove the head of a Department. If the power of removal inheres both in the President and in the Senate it is so by constitutional provision, it is so by constitutional principle, and Congress has no right and no authority to attempt by legislation the modification of the existence or exercise of that power.

It is, then, according to my opinion, a judicial question under the Constitution, and is to be adjudged by the Constitution and by the provisions of the Constitution. If the President removes a Cabinet officer, the question might arise by a writ of quo warranto, or some other judicial proceeding, inquiring into the right of the successor of that removed Cabinet officer to perform the duties of the place, and in that way it would become a judicial question under the Constitution, not for control or modification by act of Congress, but simply to be adjudged of by the courts as a question arising in court under the Constitution itself.

That view of the subject will induce me to vote against the amendment of the House. If it was a doubtful question, the expediency and the absolute necessity of the exercise of this power by the President is so great, so vital, that I would surrender any doubt that I had in relation to the principle, and would concede to the President the power and the right to remove his Cabinet officers.

I concur in the suggestions so forcibly made by the Senator from Ohio that the President cannot get along at all in the administration of his department of the Government with any sort of convenience in administration of the Government generally without the exercise of this power. I once had a conversation with Mr. John Quincy Adams in which he adverted to the state of relations between his father when he was President of the United States and his Secretary of State, Mr. Timothy Pickens. Mr. Adams stated to me distinctly, and in terms of extreme condemnation of Mr. Pickens, that he was holding on to his office and was thwarting his father in the administration of the executive department of the Government from day to day as opportunity afforded. He spoke in great harshness and condemnation of Mr. Pickens's course, and in no other terms I think than any just man would speak of any Cabinet officer who acted the same part toward the President from whom he held his appointment. I cannot conceive of a greater breach of official propriety and of the just relations that ought to subsist between a President and his subordinates than for a Cabinet officer to hold on to his place when his judgment and his whole action and influence are thrown against the administration of the President. Yet this would be the anomalous and mischievous condition of things unless the President was clothed with a power to remove his Cabinet officer at his pleasure.

Under the two views of this subject I have presented I will not hesitate, whatever may have been the opinion that I expressed in 1840 so decidedly upon the point, now to vote against the proposed amendment of the House.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not rise to prolong the debate, but only to express the hope that the debate on this question may terminate and that we may come to a vote. The time left of the session and the pressure of business admonishes me, as I have no doubt it does every other Senator, of the necessity of condensing debate. While I should be glad to occupy some time in reply to some things that have fallen in the course of this debate, I feel it to be due to the business of the Senate to abstain. I hope the Senate will disagree to this amendment and adhere to the bill as it stands.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 17, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Creswell, Fogg, Fowler, Howard, Howe, Lane, Morrill, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cattell, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Kirkwood, McDougall, Nesmith, Norton, Patterson, Poland, Riddle, Salisbury, Sherman, Stewart, and Williams—28.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cragin, Guthrie, Morgan, Nye, Sprague, Van Winkle, and Wiley—7.

So the amendment was non-concurred in.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has received and been requested to present to the Senate the petition of George W. Staples, praying for an amendment of the law relating to national banking associations. The petition sets forth that it is the practice of the banks in the city of New York to certify to the checks of many persons, brokers principally, doing a large business with the banks when those persons have no funds in the bank, and that such a practice is of very disastrous effect upon the banks and upon the public, stockholders and others. He prays for a law that shall subject to penalties officers who thus certify when there are no funds in the banks. This petition, if there be no objection, will be received, together with the bill accompanying it, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have been requested to ask that F. A. Patterson be permitted to withdraw from the files the papers relative to a claim made by him to Congress upon which a bill was passed as a law at the last session of Congress. He wants to use the papers for some purpose, exactly what purpose I do not know; but as I understand from a colleague of mine in the House a bill was passed last session in his favor, and he asks leave to withdraw the paper on which the bill was passed. Leave was granted.

The committee were not willing to report against the memorial, but it was not accompanied by any evidence, and the committee were unable to get from the Department satisfactory evidence of any equity on the part of the memorialist.

The committee were discharged.

PREVENTION OF SMUGGLING.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the amendment of the House to the bill (S. No. 525) supplementary to an act to prevent smuggling, and for other purposes, approved July 18, 1866, have directed me to report it back with a recommendation that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House, and I ask for immediate action upon it if there be no objection.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House, which was to add to the bill the following additional sections:

And be it further enacted, That section twenty-six of the act aforesaid be so amended that the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized in his discretion to make such regulations as shall enable vessels engaged in the coasting trade between ports and places upon Lake Michigan exclusively, and laden with American productions and free merchandise only, to unload their cargoes without previously obtaining a permit to unload.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 273) for the relief of Walter C. Whitaker; and

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 874) to regulate the duties of the Clerk of the House of Representatives in preparing for the organization of the House, and for other purposes; and the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 902) to declare the sense of an act entitled "An act to restrict the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims and to provide for the payment of certain demands for quartermasters' stores and subsistence supplies furnished the Army of the United States; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

COMPENSATION OF CIVIL EMPLOYÉS.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 224) giving additional compensation to certain employés in the civil service of the Government at Washington, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. DOOLITTLE to amend the amendment proposed by Mr. WILLIAMS, by inserting before "State," in line nine, the words "Executive Mansion."

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to have some reason given for that.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will simply state that one of the watchmen employed in the Executive Mansion called on me and stated that the resolution as it stood made a distinction between them and the watchmen employed in the Departments. That is all the information I had on the subject. I supposed the same rule should apply to watchmen there as elsewhere.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The difference is that the watchmen at the Executive Mansion get $900 apiece, while the watchmen in the Departments get only $720. The whole matter was revised in regard to the Executive Mansion last year and the compensation of all the employés there fixed. I think the watchmen there were then put on the same footing with watchmen at the Capitol, who get more than watchmen in the Departments. I am not convinced that this amendment ought to be made. The proposition in the shape it is now put by the honorable Senator from Oregon is predicated upon the idea that these salaries were fixed at a recent period, and therefore ought not to be increased.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have already stated that the only information I have received was—

Mr. FESSENDEN. Allow me to call the Senator's attention to this clause in the appropriation bill, which I propose to take up to-day: "For compensation of two watchmen at the President's House, $1,440." We propose to correct that by making the amount $1,800, under a law passed in 1866 fixing their salaries at $900. The watchmen in the Departments get $720.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That being the state of the case, of course I shall not insist on my amendment. I withdraw it.

Mr. STEWART. I propose an amendment to the amendment by inserting in the eighteenth line, after the word "meters," the words "and the crier and messengers of the Supreme Court of the United States." These persons receive by a law passed some years ago three dollars a day during the session of the court, and no more. I spoke to the chairman of the Finance Committee the other day in regard to them, and he was under the impression that their pay was fixed by some arrangement allowed by the court. That is not the fact; it is fixed by law at three dollars a day, and they are only paid during the days they are actually in service, so that it amounts to a very small compensation. Twenty per cent. on that makes but a small amount.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They are at liberty to attend to other business at other times. They are paid out of the judiciary fund. There are several cases where men are paid out of a fund that is placed at the discretion of particular officers. I think that these officers are of that class, and the law does not fix their compensation.

Mr. STEWART. Yes, it does; a statute fixes it at three dollars a day, and it is the only compensation allowed to them.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is while they are actually employed during the session of the court, and they are at perfect liberty to attend to other business during all the rest of the year, and indeed can carry on other business all the time. There is no reason why we should go out of the Departments into the Supreme Court. We might just as well extend it to the courts of the District of Columbia. There is no end if we begin to extend this provision beyond the Departments for which we are professing to legislate, and bring in everybody else. I am opposed to the first step, because if the door is once opened there is no end to it. Why should we extend this twenty per cent., which it is proposed to give to certain persons in the Departments for reasons applicable to them, to others having no connection with the Departments?

Mr. STEWART. I will simply remark that this resolution is pretty general already. It includes everybody about the Capitol here, I believe, pretty much; and this amendment is to provide for a very small number of persons who receive a small compensation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The only person about the Capitol who is included in the resolution is the superintendent of meters, who gets about six hundred dollars a year.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It seems to me this amendment ought to be adopted. From what I understand about it, these persons are about the least paid of any employes almost.

Mr. MORRILL. I inquire whether this amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada can be amended?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks not. It is an amendment to an amendment. A further amendment would be an amendment in the third degree.

Mr. MORRILL. Then perhaps I shall accomplish my object by stating that the bailiffs and criers in the supreme court of the District of Columbia have only two dollars a day. I do not oppose this amendment; I am rather inclined to think it should be adopted; but I desire to say that if the committee think it allowable to extend the resolution beyond its present limits it should, in my opinion, embrace the parties to whom I have referred.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope we shall not go beyond the Departments. If we do there is no knowing where we shall stop. Everybody comes in who is in the public employment in any capacity, no matter where, all over this District, at the arsenal, the navy-yard, and the printing office, everywhere, men who are as well paid as others doing the same work in private employment, and many of whom get the money the Government pays them without interfering with their ordinary business.

The question being put upon the amendment to the amendment, there were, on a division—ayes 13, noes 15; and it was declared to be rejected.

Mr. STEWART. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to know if the yeas and nays can be called for after the result of the vote has been declared?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Strictly not in the opinion of the Chair. The yeas and nays, however, were called for in this case while the Chair was announcing the result. The Chair thinks that after the announcement is fairly made it is too late to call for the yeas and nays. The Chair is inclined, however, to entertain the call, because it is in the power of the Senate always to refuse the yeas and nays, for they can only be ordered by one fifth of the Senators present.

Mr. STEWART. I withdraw the call.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment is disagreed to. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. RAMSEY. I wish to move an amendment to the amendment, to provide for what I think must be a case of omission. The case to which I call attention is clearly contemplated by the general character of this resolution; but there is no provision made for it. I refer to the case of the employes at the arsenal. They are in some way connected with the War Office, for a large number of the employes of which provision is made. Their services are certainly very indifferently compensated, and are often very perilous. I think of all classes they ought to be included. It is a clear case of omission, as I have no doubt the committee will think when they come to reflect upon it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We have reflected on it; we had it before us.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move to insert the word "arsenal" after the word "navy-yard" in the thirteenth line, so as to include the employes of the arsenal.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope no Senator will suppose that any omission in this resolution resulted from oversight, for if there ever was a measure that was carefully considered upon the representations of all parties concerned this is one. I have been overwhelmed with applications from all the employes of the Government in this District of every description in reference to its provisions. I will say that applications have been made by the employes at the arsenal, the navy-yard, Government Printing Office, and other places where persons are employed, and by the laborers upon the Capitol extension and the Treasury extension, for a provision in this resolution to embrace them. And if the employes of the arsenal be now embraced, then all the employes at the navy-yard, on the Capitol and Treasury extensions, and in the Government Printing Office ought to be embraced, for there is no reason for making any discrimination; and it is a question for the Senate to determine whether these mechanics and laborers and others who are employed at these different places shall or shall not be embraced within the provisions of this resolution.

There are about twelve hundred persons employed at the navy-yard, some three or four hundred at the arsenal, some five or six hundred in the Government Printing Office, and several hundred upon the Capitol and Treasury extensions. Twenty per cent. upon the wages paid to all these employes, as nearly as I can estimate it—of course I have not obtained any very great accuracy—would amount to between three and four hundred thousand dollars. I desire to have the Senate determine the question. If the motion of the honorable Senator from Minnesota prevails I shall then insist that the resolution shall embrace all the persons employed in these different places, for there is no reason in the world why they should not be included.

There is a large number of poor women employed in the Government Printing Office, some one hundred and sixty, who only receive from twenty-five to fifty dollars per month for their services. They have made most pathetic appeals to me to include them in this resolution, as though I had entire control of the matter, and it was not in any way the action of the committee; but it was the decision of the majority of the committee that these persons ought not to be included.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The unanimous decision?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It was the decision of the committee as to these persons employed by the day that they should not be included in this resolution. Those who have the superintendence of these different offices can raise their wages, if they see proper to do so, whenever in their judgment they earn more than they now receive. For these reasons, and as they receive a larger compensation than is received by mechanics from employers anywhere, and as the Government is punctual in the payment of their wages, it was not thought advisable to include them. I know that it is difficult to find any stopping place in such a bill as this; but there must be some limit somewhere to this appropriation. As the resolution now stands, in my opinion, as near as I can judge, the appropriation will not fall short of a million of dollars; and if it be extended from one class of persons to another there will no end to it.

I submit these considerations for the action of the Senate. I say that if the employes in the arsenal are included, all these others ought to be included also.

Mr. WADE. I do not see any principle in the limitation which the committee have made in restricting the provisions in this resolution to the particular employes named in it. Are they more worthy of the enhancement of their wages than others who now apply, in the arsenal, navy-yard, and printing office? Indeed, the Senator from Oregon himself tells us that their compensation is a very meager one, and that they are as much under the necessity of an increase as those for whom he has provided. Although it is somewhat burdensome to extend the provision to all these persons, I really cannot see why, if you begin to make this kind of appropriation, you should stop short of carrying out the principle by extending it to all who come within the reason of the case. I am persuaded that many of these employes, whether they get as much wages as persons do in other places or not, have a very hard time to get along with what they do receive, and I believe that the Government is able to pay its employes in such sort that they shall be comfortably provided for with prudence on their part. I do not believe that is the case now.

I hope the resolution will be extended to all the classes that were mentioned by the Senator from Oregon. They are as meritorious and as much under the necessity for this relief as those already provided for in the resolution. I do not believe any Government was ever put to serious disadvantage because of the compensation it paid to its actual laboring employes. It is infinitely more burdened by great salaries to those who do nothing; but those who do the actual labor generally fare pretty hard. I believe the Government is able to give them a compensation that with prudence and industry on their part will make them comfortably off. I think it ought to do so, and I do not believe that it will be a detriment to the Government to do so. It is an act of justice, nothing more. I believe that Governments may be burdened by sinecures, but I never heard of any difficulty because of the compensation which was paid to actual laborers. You do not best give them enough to burden the Government at all. I hope the provision will be extended to all these classes.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President—

Mr. FESSENDEN. If my friend will give way, I will now move to take up the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly, I yield for that purpose.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that all prior orders be postponed, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 896.

Mr. CHANDLER. I gave notice a few days ago that I should press the Niagara canal bill the moment the bankrupt bill was disposed of. It is useless, I know, to antagonize anything with an appropriation bill; but I wish to give notice that the moment this bill is through I shall endeavor to get up the Niagara ship-canal bill and to obtain a vote upon it. I would thank the Senator from Maine if he would allow me to take it up now, and let his bill lie over informally.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I can hardly consent to make provisions for other bills. I must insist upon my motion.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1144) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the House of Representatives of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867;

A bill (H. R. No. 1146) for the relief of Mrs. Elizabeth Fletcher; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 275) to extend the time for the use of certain vessels for quarantine purposes at the port of New York.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 525) supplementary to an act to prevent smuggling, and for other purposes, approved July 18, 1866; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 896) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867, which had been reported from the Committee on Finance with various amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest that the sense of the Senate be taken upon the amendments reported by the committee as they are reached in the reading of the bill. It will expedite business, and, if there be no objection, that course will be pursued. The Chair hears no objection.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Finance was on pages 6 and 7, lines one hundred and thirty-nine, one hundred and forty, and one hundred and forty-one, in the clause making an appropriation for the Capitol police, to strike out the words "amounting to $50,000, one half of which is to be paid by the Senate."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire to move an amendment on page 12, after line two hundred and eighty-five, under the heading of "For the general purposes of the building occupied by the State Department." I move to insert:

For rent of said building, $15,000.

For alterations and improvements of the building and for means of protection against its destruction by fire, $15,000.

This was necessary according to the recommendation of a letter received from the Secretary of State.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 14, line three hundred and twenty-four, in the clause making an appropriation for compensation of the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post Office Department and the clerks in his office, to insert the words "chief clerk" after the word "Department."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 15, line three hundred and thirty-nine, in the clause providing for the office of the Solicitor of the Treasury, to insert the word "laborer" after the word "clerks."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 16, line three hundred and sixty-two, to strike out the final "s" in the words "records" and "journals."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ANTHONY in the Chair). That amendment being a mere verbal alteration will be considered as agreed to, if there be no objection.

The next amendment was on page 16, under the head of "Contingent Expenses of the Treasury Department," after line three hundred and eighty-two, to insert:

For temporary clerks in the Treasury Department, $50,000: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to classify the clerks authorized according to the character of their services.

Mr. SUMNER. I wish to ask the Senator from Maine if that does not leave a certain discretion to the Secretary of the Treasury which, at this time, it is hardly advisable to leave to him? And I may state a case. What assurance is there that the Secretary of the Treasury, in the exercise of this discretion, "to classify the clerks authorized according to the character of their services," will not classify them according to his political or personal preferences? I have heard that he has done that at the Treasury Department; that on former occasions, in the exercise of this discretion, he has allowed himself to be controlled by those considerations rather than by the merits of the individual. I should not make this inquiry if I had not heard that circumstances had occurred at the Department which justified it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no belief that that is true. It is necessary if you make the appropriation—and the appropriation is unquestionably necessary—that the Secretary should have some discretion about it. This is not like the provision that was inserted in the appropriation bill last year. That appropriated $160,000, the balance remaining in his hands for temporary clerks and to make extra compensation to clerks and other officers. It appropriated about two hundred thousand dollars in the whole. All that is struck out at this session. This item is confined simply to the appointment of temporary clerks, which he must have, which he has now and must continue to have in greater or less numbers. This amendment was reported by the Committee on Appropriations, which certainly was not disposed to allow the Secretary too much power or discretion, in the original bill in the House of Representatives; but a good deal of inquiry took place and considerable disturbance was made about it, and it was struck out rather by the consent of the chairman with a view, I suppose, that it should be taken up in the Senate. It is unquestionably necessary that this sum should be appropriated for the purpose of employing temporary clerks. The business of the Department has required it for years, and will continue to require it. The sum is a small one. If the Secretary has the power to employ temporary clerks he will want to employ clerks of different grades unquestionably. He will need some men whom he cannot get for $1,200, the lowest salary. The amendment has no reference to the regular clerks in the Department, but to the temporary clerks who are employed.

As to this story about the Secretary's advancing men according to his political and personal preferences and all that, I do not believe a word of it. Such complaints exist always. It is always the case where there are so many men employed that those who are not advanced think they are superior to others who are advanced. We cannot always see ourselves as others see us; and that applies to the Departments as well as to other places. Mistakes may have been made. Men may have been advanced where better men might have been found. That depends in a very great degree upon the heads of the bureaus and the heads of the divisions. They know who the men are, and they make the recommendations. I do not believe myself that the Secretary has made any appointments of that description unless on the recommendation of those who were at the heads of bureaus and the heads of divisions, and they are almost universally men that you could not complain of on account of their politics; there may be a few exceptions. But the power must exist. The idea of having a Secretary of the Treasury and allowing him no discretion at all in his own office with regard to these things is a perfect absurdity. You must trust him unless you mean to abolish the office or abolish the individual. It must be done as long as there is a Secretary of the Treasury. For myself, I have no idea that there is anything in this story more than in the complaints that come always from disappointed men who think their claims are superior to those of others, and that their capacity is superior to that of others. It is always the case everywhere. All cannot have the places, and those who do not get them are disappointed.

Mr. SUMNER. I wish I could see the Secretary of the Treasury as the Senator from Maine paints him. I think the Senator paints entirely an imaginary character. The Secretary of the Treasury, as I see him, is a very different person. However, I will for the moment content myself merely with expressing my dissent from the beautiful picture presented by the Senator.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I presented no picture. I merely stated my belief.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator simply stated his belief; but his belief really is a picture, and he must allow me to say a picture which seems to me to be drawn from his imagination.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I leave all matters of imagination to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SUMNER. When the Senator, as he rarely attempts it, does draw upon his imagination, we all know how effective he is. On this occasion the Senator has drawn upon his imagination.

Now, I have in my hand certain papers with relation simply to one bureau of the Treasury; that is the Sixth Auditor's office. It seems that by the act of last year there was certain extra compensation which was to be apportioned in the Treasury Department according to certain principles. In the Sixth Auditor's office that extra compensation was distributed, as the papers will show, according to political partialities. I do not know the persons, but I have in my hand a list of names with a proper characterization, and from this list it will appear that there was the most offensive exercise of power on that occasion. I presume that the Secretary of the Treasury must be responsible for it. Is he not?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Of course.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from Illinois says, "of course." It was in the bureau of the Sixth Auditor. In that bureau it seems there were eleven persons, of whom a majority were Republicans, who received the extra compensation. These were the chief clerk, the principal of the pay division, the principal register, the principal of the money-order division, the principal book-keeper, the principal of the examining division, the principal of the foreign mail, and the solicitor, and also one third-class clerk and a second-class clerk; being eleven persons; but all these, as I understand, were so high in service that they came naturally within the sphere of this extra compensation.

Mr. HOWE. And came within the order of the Secretary himself.

Mr. SUMNER. And they came, as my friend reminds me, within the order of the Secretary himself. But when we get beyond this list, when we get among the general clerks, if I may so say, what do we find? We find that all this money is given to persons who are members of what is known as the Johnson Departmental Club. I have in my hands the following list, which I will read:

"Political status of those selected by the Auditor who do not perform what are called analogous duties: C. A. Tavenor, Johnson Departmental Club; J. O. Wilson, also of that club; W. H. Sullivan, also of that club; J. P. Maguire, also of that club; Joseph Bulloch, also of that club; F. M. Lator, also of that club; C. G. McEran, also of that club; W. W. Cox, secessionist, and also of that club; W. C. Lipscomb, Jr., secessionist, and also of that club; J. A. Jewell, Democrat, appointed from Mississippi by Jefferson Davis; F. B. Lilley, a Johnson man at the election time; G. H. Thomas, doubtful."

Then I am told that the remaining six on the Auditor's list are believed to be Republicans; but it is doubtful how some of them would have voted at the election. Now, the Republicans in that bureau number ninety, the Johnson men thirty, doubtful six; and yet where there is that relative proportion of Republicans and of Johnson men and of doubtful men, you have this lion's share of the compensation given to men whose chief recommendation is, that they were members of the Johnson Departmental Club, or secessionists, or appointees of Jefferson Davis.

That is in one of the bureaus of the Treasury Department. Senators about me say that of course the Secretary of the Treasury is responsible for it. I should suppose he must be held responsible for it. The question now is, whether we can commit that discretion to him. I agree with the Senator from Maine that as a general thing discretion must be lodged somewhere, and that it would seem with regard to the Treasury Department that we must either abolish the office or abolish the man. And yet if we can take any precaution suggested by the experience of the past should we not do it? Are you willing to allow the $50,000 that you are about to appropriate to be distributed in this unequal way and according to the unhappy political proclivities of the Secretary of the Treasury? I think that we ought to take some precaution against it. I do not wish, however, to prevent this allowance of money. I wish to secure it for the benefit of these men and the business of the Department. I am contented with the statement of the Senator from Maine that the Department needs this additional service; but then I ask the Senator to give us some provision by which we shall prevent its being prostituted as there is reason to believe a similar allowance on another occasion has been prostituted by the head of that Department.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will the Senator allow me to ask what his authority is for the statement he has made?

Mr. SUMNER. I have a statement here from—

Mr. FESSENDEN. Who signs it?

Mr. SUMNER. It is from a gentleman who is known to Senators on this floor.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What is his name?

Mr. SUMNER. I understand the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Howe] knows him personally.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What is his name?

Mr. SUMNER. I would rather not give his name.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is the way the Senator attempts to influence the Senate by reading a letter from a man who does not want his name given. He is probably a clerk in the office who did not get the money.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from Wisconsin knows him personally; I do not; but I had reason to believe that his statement was as much to be relied upon as that of any Senator.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What reason had the Senator to believe so?

Mr. SUMNER. From what I was told.

Mr. FESSENDEN. By whom?

Mr. SUMNER. That I do not remember.

The letter I received now a month ago.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well; I should like to know what authority the Senator has to say he was so told. Who told him this man was to be relied upon? Is he a clerk in that bureau?

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from Maine has dealings enough with persons here to know very well that one cannot remember day by day all the conversations he has with people.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I never make a statement in this Senate on the authority of a man whose name I am not ready to give. I do not get up on loose statements, anonymous letters, or letters which are equivalent to anonymous letters, because the writer will not suffer his name to be used, and attack officers of the Government. I think the practice is entirely unjustifiable.

Mr. SUMNER. As to anonymous letters I agree with the Senator.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well; but the man who makes a statement affecting the character and conduct of the Department in which he is, and is unwilling his name should be used, is nothing else but an anonymous writer. I want to know who the man is. Does the Senator from Wisconsin know anything about it?

Mr. HOWE. If it is from the man I suppose it is, I know the man. That letter is not addressed to me and I have no authority to communicate his name. He was a clerk in the Sixth Auditor's office, at the head of a division, and received his regular share of that money. He never found a word of complaint as to the treatment that was bestowed upon him, but did think he had two grounds for complaint. One was, I believe, that not a dollar of it was given to any clerk in his division, and he was not consulted in reference to the clerks in his division. Another reason is the reason presented in the letter itself, that a large proportion of the money was given to those who are classed politically as Democrats or as Johnson men to the exclusion of the large majority of those clerks who are known as Republicans. Those are the only two complaints I ever heard him make. As to the personal character of the man I have no doubt he is as truthful a man as any on this floor.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The statement itself shows that the Secretary of the Treasury has done what was his duty about this matter. He gave his orders as to the principle upon which this extra compensation should be distributed.

Mr. HOWE. If the Senator will allow me, I understand the order of the Secretary went no further than this: that those who were at the head of divisions should receive a share of the extra compensation, and those filling analogous positions should receive a share of the extra compensation; and the number of clerks in the Sixth Auditor's office who under that rule received extra compensation was eleven; but outside of that, as the Senator from Massachusetts has read, there were a large number of clerks—

Mr. FESSENDEN. How large? I should like to know what number.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator from Massachusetts has read the names.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Some half a dozen.

Mr. SUMNER. Much more than that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Not much more.

Mr. SUMNER. Twelve persons who were members of the Johnson Departmental Club or secessionists.

Mr. FESSENDEN. How does this man know that they were secessionists?

Mr. SUMNER. That I do not know.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Now, I know the man's name.

Mr. HOWE. Perhaps you will state it, then.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I cannot state it. He has not written that letter to me. He has written another similar to it to me, and I examined the whole of his statement and inquired about it and became satisfied that the man was writing in temper and from bad feeling. Now, how in the world can the Secretary of the Treasury distribute this money to each clerk and overlook each clerk and inquire as to each clerk's politics? The Secretary of the Treasury makes a general order; in distributing this money he gives it to the heads of divisions and the chief clerks and the leading officers of the Department, and he leaves the balance to whom? To the Auditor himself. The Auditor sends up the names and gets the money. Probably it does not go to the Secretary of the Treasury at all after the Auditor has designated the names. I cannot say how that is.

Mr. HOWE. It must under the law.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It must in a certain form, but he is not obliged to put his name to everything of that sort. He approves generally. He cannot go over the details of all these things in the Department. I know something on the subject from experience. It must be left to the principal men in the Department who do the labor. The Secretary cannot look over everything. He gives a general order, and then when the matter is made up he directs. He cannot look over everything. But as far as he did go in this matter he went right.

Now, with regard to the Sixth Auditor, why did not Senators oppose his confirmation?

Mr. SUMNER. When was he nominated?

Mr. FESSENDEN. At this session. He was confirmed in the place of a gentleman from Chicago, Mr. Arnold. Mr. Arnold resigned and he was appointed.

Mr. SUMNER. When was he confirmed?

Mr. FESSENDEN. A fortnight or three weeks ago. He is from my State, and a Democrat. My colleague and I did not see fit to oppose him. We knew he was a very excellent officer, and we did not suppose a better one would be got if he was rejected, and we made no opposition to him. His nomination did not go to my committee. I believe it went to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and was recommended by the committee on the ground of his being a very excellent officer and a very competent man, who had had considerable experience heretofore.

Mr. RAMSEY. His nomination was reported favorably on the ground that the Senators from Maine had no objection to him.

Mr. FESSENDEN. And I believe if he made such a distribution as has been stated he was imposed upon.

Mr. HOWE. I guess that was the ground of his confirmation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What?

Mr. HOWE. On the ground that the Senator from Maine recommended him.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I did not recommend him.

Mr. HOWE. You recommended his confirmation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir, I did not recommend his confirmation. I never was inquired of about it one way or the other.

Mr. RAMSEY. I inquired of the colleague of the Senator and he approved of his confirmation, and having consulted the Senator now on the floor he said he would make no opposition.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I said I would make no opposition. I so told my colleague, and he said he should make no opposition; not because he was from Maine. I would not have appointed him. If he had come to me for a recommendation for it I should have refused him. I would not have thought of appointing him, because I know what his politics are, and I would not think of appointing a Democrat to one of these offices; but he was appointed and the Senate confirmed him. The case went before the Post Office Committee. It should have gone to the Committee on Finance, as he was an officer in the Treasury Department; but it was not sent there for some reason or other, I do not know what, probably by accident. Now I say that he is a good officer and a very capable man. That I know.

So far as the action of that bureau in this matter is concerned I know nothing about it; but so far as the Secretary of the Treasury is concerned it appears all he has done with reference to it has been proper. He knew nothing about this, could know nothing about it. You do not suppose the Secretary of the Treasury, with all he has to do, is inquiring about the politics of every man in his Department?

Mr. SUMNER. He is inquiring about the politics of men in distant parts of the country.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I doubt very much whether he is doing that.

Mr. SUMNER. There is evidence of it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I know the Senator does not very much like the Secretary of the Treasury; but I beg him to do him justice. He may do some things that the Senator does not like and other Senators do not like. I do not like his support of Mr. Johnson's policy, because I do not support that policy myself; but that the Secretary of the Treasury is an upright man and means to discharge the duties of his office faithfully and to the best of his ability I have no manner of doubt. Whatever his politics may be, and however Senators may like his course politically, I say that, because it is due to him to say it. I believe it firmly.

Now, then, with reference to this particular thing, what does the Senator or any Senator propose? The Secretary must have this amount of money, in my judgment and in the judgment of the committee, appropriated for this purpose. This appropriation is not going as far as the one alluded to went. There is nothing here to raise anybody's salary. All that is struck out. It is for the mere appointment of temporary clerks. The other appropriation referred to the permanent clerks in the Department who were to receive pay under it. This appropriation covers no such thing. It is the mere ordinary appropriation which he must have to appoint temporary clerks, persons now out of the Department, not permanent officers. Then he must classify them; that is, he must have different kinds of men; he must give some more and some less. If he is not to decide, who is? What does the Senator propose in place of it? Would he have the assignment made by Mr. Anderson, the Sixth Auditor, that this man complains of? And his is the only case in the whole Department where the head of a bureau has been changed and a Democrat appointed; that is, of any of the regular bureaus, all the rest are of a different political character.

But what I say with reference to this matter is this: here is an appropriation that, in my judgment and in the judgment of the committee, must be made; here is a discretion that must be exercised with regard to the use of this money, that is, the classification of these clerks. Now, if the Secretary of the Treasury is not to decide that question, who is? What does the Senator propose? If he merely proposes to raise this question and make this complaint, let him make it against the Auditor; the Secretary has nothing to do with it in the world; that is to say, nothing consciously. I will venture to say, because I know from my acquaintance with the business there, that he could not look over the politics of all these men one way or the other. If it has been so in that particular bureau, I do not believe it has been in others; and from all that appears, although they were members of the Johnson Departmental Club, they might have been the very ones who should receive it. They do not give the money on account of politics.

But with regard to this informant, I took pains to inform myself from good authority with regard to him, and I was satisfied that he was influenced by anything but a desire for the public good. He wanted to defeat Mr. Anderson's confirmation and get him rejected by the Senate. That is the reason of his supplying that information; but in that he did not succeed.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from Maine forgot in his remarks how I introduced this matter. I stated that I was in favor of giving to the Treasury Department all that it needed in the conduct of its business, but I asked the Senator to allow me to put to him a question, whether it was not possible in some way to limit the discretion of the Secretary in the exercise of this power? I put the question, and I said that I was moved to put it because there was something in the history of that Secretary that at least made me hesitate about conferring upon him any additional discretion. That was the way I opened this question.

I have not yet said that I should vote against this amendment, nor have I moved any limitation. I wished to make a statement of facts, and to invite from the Senator from Maine such explanations as he might feel disposed to make with regard to the Secretary of the Treasury and the degree of confidence which the Senate might repose in him. He has made the statement, and in making this statement he has undertaken to throw from the Secretary the responsibility of the transaction to which I referred and to cast it upon the Sixth Auditor. I cannot agree with him. I think if that thing has been done according to the statement which I have made, the responsibility belongs to the head of the Department; and I do not doubt that the Sixth Auditor in doing it understood well that he was carrying out the views of his chief. I have no idea that the Secretary gave to the Sixth Auditor a list of names, but he gave him something that was equally potential. He whispered in his ear or let him well understand that members of the Johnson Departmental Club were the men to be preferred in securing this extra compensation. I believe that, because it is according to the nature of things, and it is according to what I may call the prevailing testimony with regard to the Secretary of the Treasury. He is notoriously an intense partisan. Whether he is upright or not I will not at this moment say. I am not on this incidental question going to be carried further into a general discussion of the merits of the Secretary of the Treasury. There will be perhaps an occasion for that, and if it comes I shall state my conclusions fearlessly. Meanwhile, let him have the credit which the Senator from Maine gives him. It is important in his favor. I think he needs it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will ask the Senator if he has any proof that the Secretary of the Treasury is a man who goes about whispering these things into the ears of others?

Mr. SUMNER. I have ample proof that he is what I called him, an intense partisan.

Mr. FESSENDEN. So is the Senator an intense partisan. Does the Senator judge the Secretary of the Treasury of his own heart, that he would do such things?

Mr. SUMNER. When the Senator addresses me a personal remark I prefer not to answer it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will not address the Senator. Now I disclaim for the Senator anything of that kind. I know that he would not; I know that he could not; I know that it is contrary to his whole nature, I know him so well; but I hint to my friend that where things of that sort are suggested with regard to others without proof, they may lead those who do not know the Senator to infer that he judges of the acts of others by what he would do himself. Therefore I think we should be careful how, without evidence, without proof, we attack a man at the head of a Department, because he is a partisan simply and opposed to us, and make suggestions derogatory to his personal honor, and suggestions that he would do things that are mean and unworthy of a man of honor. That is not the way to speak of men without proof. If you have proof, so be it. If you have not, it ought not to be said. Everybody knows that no one differs more widely with the Secretary of the Treasury with regard to his notions of reconstruction than I do; but I have watched him carefully, and I do not believe any of these statements with regard to his hunting up men and punishing them for their political opinions or anything of the sort, one way or the other.

Mr. SUMNER. I do.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator does. I do not. I am at liberty to express my opinion. As I said before, I regard the Secretary of the Treasury as an able and upright officer. That he has made appointments or recommended appointments that do not suit us, and perhaps for political purposes, may be, and very probably is in some cases. But Senators must reflect that although these recommendations come from the head of a Department—I know nothing about it in this case—the head of the Department cannot always command the appointments themselves; that when he recommends an officer, it is not unfrequent that he recommends an officer because he is ordered to recommend an officer by the appointing power. That was the case over and over again in many cases in the War Department during the Presidency of Mr. Lincoln. How many recommendations were sent in here of nominations—"by direction of the President, I nominate such a man or recommend such a man to be appointed a brigadier general," or something of that sort. I know very well, I have had experience enough to know, that the head of the nation, who is the appointing power, very frequently assumes to direct whom he shall appoint; and it is the habit of members of Congress when the Secretary of the Treasury, or any other Secretary, will not come to their views with regard to an appointment, to go over his head to the President.

Mr. CONNESS. What else can they do in such cases?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Nothing. That is their own way to accomplish their purpose undoubtedly.

Mr. CONNESS. It is the only way to be heard by the appointing power.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Undoubtedly. I am not complaining of it. They go to the Secretary of the Treasury or the Secretary of War. They ask him to make an appointment; to recommend a certain man for appointment. He says, "I will not do it." They go then to the President and request him to do it. I am not disputing the right; but is the Secretary responsible for what the President does? That is what I am talking about. He is not to be held responsible for what is done over his head under the solicitation of a member of Congress.

What I object to, therefore, is the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts, expressing his belief with regard to these things without anything but his belief, and substantially accusing a man, whom I believe to be an honorable man, who holds a high and honorable position, of a meanness, of doing indirectly and meanly what he had not the courage to do directly in the first place. The Senator is not justified, in my judgment, in making any such accusations. They are unworthy of the officer, and I know that the Senator would not do any such thing himself under any circumstances.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from Maine insists upon saying that the Secretary of the Treasury is an upright man. I have not said that he was not. The Senator from Maine insists that the Secretary of the Treasury is not a mean man. I have not said that he was a mean man.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But you believed he would do a mean thing; and that is substantially the same thing.

Mr. SUMNER. Not at all. I have not said that I believed he would do a mean thing. I have said he was an intense partisan, and I could not give him my confidence.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Did not the Senator say he believed that he whispered into the ear of the Sixth Auditor how he wanted this fund to be distributed?

Mr. SUMNER. Yes.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well. That I call meanness.

Mr. SUMNER. Then that is the characterization of the Senator; it is not mine. I have not said that it was mean. I have not said that the Secretary does a meanness. I have said, and I do not doubt it, that he intimates to the heads of bureaus the character of appointments they should make.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not believe a word of it.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator does not believe it. Very well. He is entitled to his belief. I do believe it. I may be mistaken; but according to my acquaintance with the Secretary and such knowledge as I have obtained from others I must adhere to my belief. I think that he does; and I think that his whispering extends wherever the telegraph can go; it runs on wires. I do not believe it is confined to one building or to one room. I believe that he is an intense partisan, and that to carry out his partisan views he is willing to do what I should be unwilling to sanction. I forbear now to characterize him. I am not going to follow the Senator from Maine at this moment into the question of the character of the Secretary of the Treasury. I have confined myself to the precise facts before us and to what he has done in his Department with regard to his clerks. I have not traveled outside of that. I have not said whether there is anything in his conduct that should make him unworthy of the position that he occupies. I have not said or raised the question whether he is a man of veracity or not. I leave all those questions to the future. I reserve my judgment upon them. I know there is evidence bearing on them; but I do not mean now to be led into that greater controversy. I am now on the simple question as to the exercise of his discretion with regard to the people immediately about him. There, according to what I have seen with my own eyes, what I have listened to from his own lips, what I know of him personally, what I have heard others say, I am led to the conclusion that he is so intense a partisan that we ought not to intrust him with any discretion that can be avoided.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have been charged with the care of a bill which to some extent involves this controversy, and I have taken some pains to investigate the subject. Representations were made to me that the funds that were placed in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury were disbursed, not with respect to the merits of the clerks and employés in the Treasury Department, but on account of political favoritism. I went to the Secretary of the Treasury and told him very plainly that such statements had been made to me, and I desired to know whether the statements were true or false. I was informed by the Secretary of the Treasury that when this fund was placed at his disposal he made an order that the heads of the respective bureaus and divisions should report to him those persons under their charge who were most meritorious, most deserving of this compensation, and that this fund was distributed altogether according to the reports made to him by these chiefs of bureaus and heads of divisions, and that a great proportion of the money was paid to men with whom he had no personal acquaintance, and of whom he had no personal knowledge except by the reports that were made to him by these persons who were required to report.

I then went to persons in the Treasury Department of whose politics I have personal knowledge—I know them to be radicals—and I inquired of them if they knew as to whether or not this fund had been distributed according to political preferences or prejudices on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury, and so far as my examination went they told me that they did not believe any such consideration entered into the distribution of this fund. I know, and the report which has been made by the Secretary of the Treasury will show, that some of the men in that Department who were known to Senators to be radical men have received the largest portion of the fund that was distributed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very much the largest.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, so far as the Sixth Auditor's office is concerned, I am not able to make any particular statement, as I have made no inquiries with reference to that particular office; but I find that the fund was distributed there among twenty-eight persons, and they are the heads of divisions or are discharging duties analogous thereto. Every man in the Sixth Auditor's office who has received any portion of this fund is either the head of a division or is discharging duties analogous thereto.

Mr. HOWE. In the Sixth Auditor's office?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOWE. Oh, no.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then this report of the Secretary of the Treasury is not to be depended upon.

Mr. SUMNER. Is it to be depended upon?

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is a question, of course, on which I do not profess to make any statement. This report, which is an official report of the Secretary of the Treasury "in answer to a resolution of December 10, relative to the disbursement of the funds appropriated as extra compensation to clerks in that Department," gives the names of the persons and the amounts they have received. One of them, the chief clerk, J. M. McGrew, received $625. There are nine others who receive $300 apiece; one received $200; two received $150; one received $100; and then there are twelve others who received fifty dollars apiece; and I find in this list the names of the persons mentioned by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Those who received fifty dollars apiece are not heads of divisions, are they?

Mr. WILLIAMS. They are heads of divisions or discharging duties analogous thereto.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I presume that was for a quarter.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir; they received fifty dollars for the last quarter. There are only twenty-eight clerks in that bureau, according to this report, who have received any portion of this extra compensation. It has all been distributed to those who were heads of divisions or discharging duties analogous thereto.

Everybody knows in what light I view the political action and principles of the Secretary; but I think it is due to the Secretary, as I have taken some pains to look into this matter, to make this statement. I do not know but that he is governed by political favoritism in the distribution of this fund; but according to the examination I have made I do not believe he is.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I did not inaugurate this discussion, and did not know any such discussion was impending. I have been drawn into it a little way, and I feel it necessary to go a little further into it. I did not know such a letter was in the possession of the Senator from Massachusetts. I did not know it was to be produced here. I know the writer of the letter.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Did the Senator have one similar?

Mr. HOWE. No, sir; not on this occasion. The facts stated in that letter were communicated to me by this same gentleman some weeks since. They were communicated to me, as the Senator from Maine has said, as presenting reasons why the Sixth Auditor should not be confirmed in the nomination of the office that had been tendered to him. The Senator from Maine asks, with considerable emphasis, why we did not oppose his confirmation. I will tell him very frankly why I did not. It was not because I doubted the truth of the statements contained in this communication; I have no manner of doubt of their truth; but I did not oppose his confirmation for these reasons: first, I advised the gentleman to communicate those facts to the Senator from Maine and also to his colleague on the other side of the Chamber. I advised him to do so in order that he might ascertain what would be the influence of those facts upon their judgment; and I told him that if they, in spite of those facts, still recommended the confirmation of this gentleman he would undoubtedly be confirmed by the Senate; at all events, I should not feel at liberty to offer any opposition.

I had another reason for not opposing him, and I stated that to him, and I will state it now to the Senate. It was that I did not feel at liberty to censure the Sixth Auditor of the Treasury Department very much for the conduct disclosed in that communication—not that I did not believe he had discriminated in favor of his political friends; but we placed the power in his hands to do that. I was opposed to doing it. I never believed that appropriation ought to be made to the Treasury Department. I opposed it as far as I could oppose it; but the Senate and the House voted that money into the hands of the Secretary to be distributed as he judged proper. It was very proper for him to take the advice of the Sixth Auditor. The Sixth Auditor, I understood, to be politically a Democrat. Now, when the question came up before the Sixth Auditor between two clerks equally competent and equally faithful as to which should have $200, when it was impossible that both should have it, I did not think it a very surprising thing that he should have given it to the Democrat and not to the Republican. If I had been in his place I am extremely afraid I should have given it to the Republican and not to the Democrat, and I should not have felt very guilty in doing so, and I am not disposed to impute any great guilt to the Sixth Auditor for doing the same thing. He never ought to have had that power in his hands, but we gave it to him; we put it there; and I am willing to take my full share of the responsibility of doing it. For these reasons I did not offer any opposition to the confirmation of the Sixth Auditor.

Now, sir, that all has reference to a question which is not before the Senate. The question before the Senate is, whether we shall appropriate a certain sum of money, not to be distributed arbitrarily among the clerks in the Treasury Department, but whether we shall appropriate a certain sum of money to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to employ temporary clerks, additional help—not extra compensation to regular officers, but an additional sum of money to employ extra help from time to time. I do not see why that ought not to be done, why it must not be done. I am sorry that that power is in the hands of an officer of whom I have the opinion that I have of the Secretary of the Treasury. I differ, as the Senator from Massachusetts differs, from the Senator from Maine in my estimate of the administration of the present Secretary of the Treasury. That he is corrupt, of course I do not say; but that he gives to the country a bad administration of the affairs of that Department I think I know. Of course I do not hold myself responsible for his political opinions. Of course he is not responsible for mine. Of course I do not stand here to attack the honesty or sincerity of the opinions that he avows; and if he sincerely believes them he has just the same right to maintain them that I have to maintain mine. The Senator from Maine, however, testifies to the country that his political opinions do not influence his administration of the affairs of that Department. There are certain facts within my knowledge that lead me to exactly the opposite conclusion, and I feel bound to state them.

The State of Wisconsin is entitled by the Constitution to six Representatives on the floor of the other House and two on this floor. It became known to us during the last session of this Congress that there was a difference of opinion upon certain political questions between the Secretary of the Treasury and a majority of the Representatives from Wisconsin in this Congress; and we were given to distinctly understand, those of us representing that State who differed from the Secretary of the Treasury, that our advice was not wanted, and our wishes were not to be consulted in reference to appointments to be made through that Department. I do not find any especial fault with the Secretary of the Treasury for shutting his ears against our advice in reference to an appointment. I should not take his advice, and I suppose for the same reason. But why would he not take our advice? Because we held to one theory of reconstruction, as it is called, and he held to another.

There was a large body of people in the United States who held to precisely the theory of reconstruction that he did, and in that large body of men he might have found men of personal character and personal integrity to fill the employments in the gift of that Department, and those employments are very numerous and very responsible. Those employments are charged with the labor of collecting from three hundred to three hundred and fifty million dollars of internal revenue. He is called upon to select men to go right into every man's house, right into every business man's counting-room, right on to their farms, right into their banks, and know the business of every man as well as the man knows it himself. It is the most delicate and the most responsible duty that ever was devolved upon any official in the United States; and it is a duty that should only be confided to the most prudent, the most honest, and the most incorruptible men we have in the country. Now, I do not say that the Secretary of the Treasury might not have gone into the ranks of those men who held to his theory of reconstruction and found men of just as much personal integrity as he could have found on the other side; but it did not suit the purposes of the Secretary of the Treasury to do that. The Secretary of the Treasury seemed to think there was some necessity for employing, not men who held to his theory of reconstruction, but men who could be selected out of the ranks of the Republican party and who would subscribe to that theory of reconstruction.

Now, then, that being the case, the patronage in his hands operated precisely as a bribe. Every dollar of it had the same effect as if so much money had been placed in his hands with which to buy up Republicans to support the opposition theory. If it was essential to have a man in any public employment who held to his peculiar opinions it was of no importance to the Secretary of the Treasury whether he was a man who held them two years before or whether he was a man who attained to those opinions during the last summer; but the Secretary thought differently. Now, what the effect of that rule of appointment was in other States I cannot say, but I know, and I say here upon my official responsibility, that in the State of Wisconsin it lowered the character of that branch of the service and lowered it immensely. There were some men in our State, I am bound to say that, of good personal character who subscribed to the theory of reconstruction advocated by the Secretary of the Treasury; but while there was one man of that character who from conviction subscribed to it there were a great many men in different parts of the State who were willing to subscribe to it for the pay that was offered. And the consequence was that a large number of these employments were put into the hands of men who sacrificed their own personal character, if they ever had any, in order to get them. I do not believe that that was treating the public service right. I do not believe that it was treating it fairly. I believe it was abusing the public service, and I feel bound to state these facts and state this conclusion.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, it was with a great deal of reluctance at the last session that I voted to place in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury $160,000, to be distributed among the employés of his Department at his discretion, and I believe I was influenced in voting for it nearly altogether by the fact that his predecessor had had a similar fund placed in his hands, had disposed of it in like manner, and I thought that a rejection of the measure at the incoming of the present Secretary might be regarded as a reflection upon him and a question by Congress of his fidelity in the disposal of that fund; therefore I felt constrained to support it. And, sir, it will take a good deal more evidence than can be contained in an anonymous communication to make me believe that the Secretary of the Treasury, or any other important officer of the Government, has executed a trust of that sort unfairly. A letter has been read, but the name has been withheld. My opinion of the impeachment of any public officer, or of any citizen, of this country by letters when the name is withheld from the Senate, I can illustrate by a circumstance in my own history. When I was the Commissioner of the General Land Office, the President of the United States handed to the Secretary of the Interior an anonymous communication making a charge against one of the clerks in the land office, a clerk that did not agree with me in politics, but I knew he was an honest, faithful clerk. The Secretary of the Interior handed that to me with instructions to make an investigation. As soon as I opened it and found that there was no responsible signature to it I handed it back to the Secretary of the Interior, and said that while I was the Commissioner of the Land Office no clerk should be put upon his trial upon any anonymous communication; and that message was carried back with the document to the President and the charge was never presented against that clerk, and he never was put upon his trial and was never turned out; and I am glad to say, at this session, he has been confirmed by this Senate to a very important and responsible position connected with the land service.

That is my opinion, practically illustrated, of this thing of charging anything upon anybody or any set of people by an anonymous communication or a letter when the author of that letter is not made known to the Senate. The man who reads a letter and withholds the name makes it an anonymous communication as far as the Senate is concerned.

I shall vote for this amendment if it is desired by the head of the Finance Committee, for the reason that I do not think it vests in the Secretary the same sort of power that was vested in him by the provision at the last session. It authorizes him to employ temporary clerks because the business of the Department is now supposed to be pressing and large.

Mr. SHERMAN. Appropriations for temporary clerks are always made.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I presume so; and I suppose the last clause of the proviso means—I ask the Senator from Ohio, who is familiar with such matters, whether that will not be the construction—that the Secretary will be required to classify them according to the classifications already known in the Department as first, second, third, and fourth class clerks. If so, there can be no objection to it; it will secure good and competent men to discharge important duties.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not exactly know whether there is any question before the Senate except that which is presented by the amendment itself which the committee proposed. The honorable member from Massachusetts has made no motion that I have heard to strike that amendment out in whole or in part. He has made an attack, as he supposed of course he had a right to make, upon the administration of the Secretary of the Treasury. It is therefore, I suppose, conceded that that appropriation is necessary, that extra clerks must be employed, and as they can only be employed upon providing compensation for them, the compensation must be voted. Now, how are the clerks to be employed? For what are they to be employed? Are they all to do the same duty? Does the honorable member from Massachusetts suppose that that is the condition of the Treasury Department? They must be assigned, if employed, to relatively separate duties; they must therefore be classed. The intelligence and ability which are required for the higher class are not required for a lower class; that which is required for the lower class is incompetent to discharge the duties of the higher class. Well, if you strike out the proviso which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to classify them in the manner all clerks are now classified in the Department, and that is to be considered as taking from him the authority to classify them, are all to be paid alike without any reference to the service that they render?

Mr. President, these assaults upon the higher officers of the Government, unless they are founded upon well ascertained facts, serve no purpose whatever, attain no result whatever but to injure the good name of the country. The idea that a Secretary of the Treasury would abuse his office, as he is supposed to have done in what to us is the anonymous letter which the gentleman from Massachusetts has read, is to suppose that he is wholly unfit, and the sooner he is displaced the better. Now, without any intimate personal acquaintance with the Secretary, and judging of the manner in which he has discharged the duties of that office, I take pleasure in stating that as far as I know him and know the manner in which he has discharged the duties of his office, he is not justly subject to the slightest reproach. If appointments of a political character have been made such as the member from Massachusetts supposes, he has not made them himself by dismissing from employment those who were competent to discharge the duties. I have reason to know, and I think the Senate, if they have read the papers of the day, would know, that he has been urged from time to time to make changes in the higher officers of his Department, and has sternly refused and has succeeded in retaining them.

Such was said to be the case. I believe it to be true with regard to the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. An amount of influence was brought to bear upon him which it was supposed he could not resist, but standing firmly to what he believed to be his duty he owed to his office and owed to the country he sternly refused, and the men are now in office. Why did he refuse? Not because he agreed in one particular politically with the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, as I understand that gentleman to be politically, or with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, but because he was satisfied that they were both good officers. The men who were urged upon him as their successors were subject to no just exception on account of character or ability; but he said, and as I think properly said, and, in my judgment, no office can be properly administered upon any other ground, that he would not turn a competent officer out upon political grounds. The vice, not beginning with this Administration, but going ages back almost, years back certainly, has been to dismiss on that account the subordinate officers of the several Departments, the result of which has been in many cases to bring into office men who were almost entirely incompetent to discharge their duties, who had nothing to recommend them but mere party services in some ward controversy or some county controversy, wholly unfit to discharge properly, and many of them without the integrity to discharge, the duties of the high trusts conferred upon them.

But I do not see that the Secretary's character is involved in this discussion. I should not have said a word upon the subject but for the remarks which fell from the honorable member from Massachusetts and from the honorable member from Wisconsin. In private life, before he came into the service of the country, he was above reproach. He administered all the affairs of the banking institution of which he was president with a rare ability; carried it successfully through the financial storms to which the whole country was subjected, and at the end of the existence of that bank, after dividing some ten or twelve per cent. annually, returned more than dollar for dollar of the capital, and no man breathed a suspicion of his integrity.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, I shall not enter into the personal controversy which has arisen here between the Senators from Maine and Massachusetts, nor shall I attempt to follow the Senators from Maine and Maryland in their high eulogiums upon the Secretary of the Treasury, or the Senators from Wisconsin and Massachusetts in what they have said that might be construed in any way as reflecting upon that officer. What I have to say relates, as I conceive, to the public interest.

I think it is an evil and a very great evil that we are vesting in the heads of Departments the extraordinary discretion which of late years we are conferring upon them; and I am glad to see upon the present occasion that even the chairman of the Committee on Finance is abandoning in some respects that vast discretion which he a few years ago advocated here with such ability and carried through the Senate. In 1865 we appropriated $250,000 to be placed in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury, to be disbursed by him among the clerks in his Department without any check whatever. I opposed that measure as strenuously as I could upon the ground that it was demoralizing, that no Secretary of the Treasury ought to want to have placed in his hands such a fund, that it must be embarrassing to him and would create heart-burning and ill feeling among the clerks in his Department, for those who did not receive a portion of it would think that they were unjustly treated. But, sir, all that I could say and all that those who agreed with me could say was overborne by the statement of the Senator from Maine that this was necessary, that a quarter of a million of money was to be placed in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury to be disbursed as he thought proper.

Now, sir, we see the results of it. I see that Senators are under some misapprehension as to the disbursements of the $160,000 which we appropriated last year. We learned something in 1866 which we did not know in 1865; for, instead of leaving $250,000 to be disbursed entirely at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, as was done in 1865, in 1866 the law defined who should receive a good portion of this money. It provided:

"That so much of the appropriation of $250,000 granted by act approved March 2, 1865, for compensation of temporary clerks in the Treasury Department, and for additional compensation to clerks in the same Department as remains unexpended shall be divided as follows, namely: $100 each shall be paid to the clerks in said Department of the first and second classes who have not received any additional compensation out of said appropriation, and who shall have served in said capacity for one year previous to July 1, 1866. And $100 shall be paid to each person employed in said Department appointed by the Secretary, at an annual salary amounting to less than $1,200, and who shall have served under such appointment for one year previous to July 1, 1866."

So that the law itself took away from the Secretary a great portion of that discretion which had, unwisely as Congress thought, been conferred upon him the year previous, because if it had not been unwisely done Congress would not have thought it expedient to limit the distribution a year ago. Now, we find the Finance Committee striking out entirely this appropriation of one hundred and fifty or two hundred thousand dollars, to be disbursed at the pleasure of the Secretary of the Treasury among the clerks in his Department, whether his favorites or not. It is all stricken out.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Finance Committee did not strike it out. It was struck out in the House.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Finance Committee have not recommended that it be restored, and I trust the head of the Finance Committee is not going to make such a recommendation. I hope not.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I would if I thought I could carry it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am sorry that the Senator from Maine is in favor of placing discretionary power in the hands of any officer of the Government when there is no necessity for it and when the matter can be regulated by law. Now, sir, the only appropriation which is asked by the Finance Committee is in the amendment before us, and that item is not in the House bill. I should like to inquire, and I hope the Senator from Maine will inform us, how it happened that this was not inserted in the bill as it passed the House?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I informed the Senate before, and if the Senator had been in his seat and listened to what I said he would have known the reason, and saved me the trouble of stating it again. The Secretary of the Treasury asked for $210,000, I think, precisely on the same terms that the appropriation was granted last year. The Committee on Appropriations of the House refused to make that appropriation, but they did recommend this appropriation of $50,000 in this way precisely, in the terms that we have moved it. A debate sprang up in the House, and as I remember it, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, for the sake of getting the bill through, abandoned this item, consented that it might be stricken out if the House chose to strike it out; did not urge it. But it was the deliberate opinion of the Committee on Appropriations that this appropriation should be made. When the bill came to the Committee on Finance of the Senate we restored it, being of opinion unanimously that it was necessary that it should be restored, and I presume that it was the understanding of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives that we should do so.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That being the opinion of the committee, I do not know but that we shall have to appropriate this sum and have to agree to this amendment that the Secretary of the Treasury shall have placed in his hands $50,000 for the purpose of employing temporary clerks. I regret that it is so. I wish that the Treasury Department could be so organized that there should be no necessity for such an appropriation; but it seems it is not, and those who are charged particularly with this branch of the public service tell us that there is a necessity for such an appropriation. It will have to go, I suppose, if that be so: but I think that the Senate and the country will feel under obligations to the Senator from Massachusetts for having brought this subject to their notice, that we may see, and all may see, how this money, placed in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury for disbursement in his discretion, has been disbursed. It may at least have this good effect: it may make him cautious in the disbursement of this sum which will now be left to his discretion.

As I said, my object in saying anything was to call the attention of the Senate to the vast discretionary power which we of late years, not in former times, have got in the habit of conferring upon heads of Departments. There is laid on my table this morning a statement of the public debt of the United States, and in that statement I see it stated that there are now in the Treasury of the United States more than one hundred and forty-two million dollars. The Government owes $2,500,000,000; and yet there is in its Treasury more than one hundred and forty-two million dollars to-day. I think the official reports will show that there has hardly been less than $142,000,000 in the Treasury at any time within a year, and I presume there has often been more than one hundred and forty-two millions in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury. I have not looked at the tables, but that is the statement to-day; and my recollection of previous statements is that a sum equally large in amount has often before been reported as being in the hands of the Secretary, and I presume that something like this has been in his hands the whole time during the last twelve months.

Now, sir, what I wish to say is, in the first place, that this is the most miserable economy, to be paying interest upon money that we owe by the thousands of millions, and have nearly one hundred and fifty million dollars in the Treasury lying idle. It is taxing the people of this country some eight or nine millions every year unnecessarily, because we are paying interest when we have the money in our Treasury with which to pay so much of our debt. But, sir, beyond that it is dangerous to the liberties of this people to have such an amount of money in the hands of any man. Why, sir, it is within the recollection of many of us that the best men in this land were alarmed at the creation of a national bank with a capital of $15,000,000. They believed it would be dangerous to the liberties of the people to charter such an institution with a capital of $15,000,000. Now, you place in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury $142,000,000, and make no provision to take it out—leave it at his discretion to do what he pleases with it.

He may put up and put down prices at his will: he may make men rich and make them poor at his will.

I said that I rose to make no accusations upon the Secretary of the Treasury. I do not say, I have not the facts that would warrant me in saying, that he has exercised the vast authority with which he is clothed so as to put money into the pockets of favorites, but he has had it in his power to do it. I am opposed to all this species of legislation which vests such vast discretionary power in the hands of any man. I know that in the management of the finances of this country, in the vast collections and disbursements we are making, there must be some money in the Treasury. Of course there would have to be a fund to some extent—

Mr. DIXON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a single question?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Certainly.

Mr. DIXON. I wish merely to understand the Senator and to know whether he holds the Secretary of the Treasury responsible for the amount of money in the Treasury.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from Connecticut had listened to what I said he would have understood me in the outset to say that I had no eulogies to pronounce upon the Secretary of the Treasury, and no attacks to make upon him; that I spoke in reference to facts open to the public; that the public good and the liberties of this people, and motives of economy, and every consideration forbade that we should leave such a vast amount of money in the hands of any man. Is that a charge on the Secretary of the Treasury? Have I said anything about his being responsible for having it?

Mr. DIXON. I did not intend to intimate that the Senator had made a charge; I merely wished to understand his remarks. I was listening to what he said with interest and desired to be instructed; and I therefore asked the Senator whether he meant to say that the fact that we have to-day $140,000,000 in the Treasury is at all to be attributed to the Secretary of the Treasury, whether he blames him for it, whether it is a thing which he could help in any manner whatever, whether he is responsible for it morally or any other way. I did not say the Senator made a charge: I asked for information.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I know not why the Senator from Connecticut should have risen to ask me whether the Secretary of the Treasury was responsible for it or not when he did not mean to suggest that I had intimated that he was. It will be time for him to inquire whether I think the Secretary of the Treasury is responsible or not when I undertake to hold him responsible, or to say that he is or is not. I took particular pains when I rose, that I might not be misunderstood, to say that I should not enter into this controversy between the Senators from Massachusetts and Maine, and should make no attack upon individuals. It is against this species of legislation which vests such vast discretionary power in the hands of the heads of Departments that I protest; my remarks are directed to that.

I was about to say, when interrupted by the Senator from Connecticut, that I supposed it was necessary that there should be a considerable sum of money, amounting I suppose to millions, all the time in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury. I am sorry that it has to be so, but that is a discretion, I take it, which is unavoidable; but will the Senator from Maine tell me or anybody else that there is any necessity for having, for a year at a time, one hundred and forty millions of money in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. FESSENDEN. How does the Senator know there has been that much for a year?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The statement on our tables shows that there is a balance of $142,000,000 now in the Treasury. I recollect that when we were in session last summer the reports showed at several times more than one hundred million dollars.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Of the present balance over ninety-seven million dollars are in gold.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Over ninety-seven million dollars of this is in gold, the value of which to-day in legal currency would be, I suppose, $125,000,000 at least, so that in reality you have in your Treasury at this time something like $170,000,000, or what is equal to it in legal currency.

Now, in reference to this particular amendment, I shall not object to it further than what I have stated. I regret the necessity of it. I suppose it will be adopted, but I am very glad that the attention which was called two years ago to this class of legislation has led, first, to the striking out of the $250,000 appropriation, and then of the $160,000 appropriation, and has brought it down to this sum of $50,000. I hope that going on improving in this way the Senator from Maine, at the next session of Congress, will strike out altogether this appropriation even of $50,000 to be disbursed by the Secretary of the Treasury in employing clerks at his pleasure, and paying them such sums as he shall deem proper.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am sorry, Mr. President, that I feel under the necessity of replying to some of the remarks of the honorable Senator from Illinois, because I think his speech is calculated to do injury and mislead the public mind. It is a very good ad captandum speech, but unfortunately a good part of it is founded on a misapprehension, and so far as the last part of it is concerned, when you come to examine it according to the facts, I think it will be found that it is built up upon a false supposition, or rather upon an ignorance of the true state of the fact.

I made no attempt at eulogizing the honorable Secretary of the Treasury. It is not my habit here to eulogize anybody. His honor being impugned and his administration of his office being impugned, I but felt it my duty, being the chairman of the Committee on Finance, to state that in my belief the Secretary of the Treasury had conducted himself in his high office with integrity and with ability. I repeat it now. It is my opinion, and the opinion will go for what it is worth.

With regard to this particular thing, when the honorable Senator did not find here the appropriation which two years ago he so much objected to, what necessity was there that he should make a long speech in order to prove that we had been wrong heretofore, and that he had been right, as he always is, and that now the Finance Committee had come at last to his opinion and to his conclusion? What object the Senator had in making such a speech when he did not find here the appropriation to which he objected, except to recall to the memory of the Senate the wise words that he uttered on a former occasion, I cannot imagine. I cannot think of any other reason, because the question did not present itself to the Senate.

I stated last year with reference to this large fund to be placed in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury for a certain purpose, that if anybody was responsible for it I was. I first recommended it. I urged it upon the Senate, and I will state briefly the reasons that operated upon me in doing so.

I thought that in these times there was an absolute necessity to increase the pay of some of the officers of the Department in order to retain their services. I hoped that these hard times would not continue, that we should soon get back to specie basis, and when we did return the present salaries would be sufficient. I was opposed, therefore, to making a permanent increase of salaries which it is almost always impossible to reduce, and preferred that in order to carry on the Department the temporary power should be given to the Secretary of the Treasury for a year or two—I did not know how long it would last—to increase the pay of those officers who could not afford to serve and would not serve for the pay they received, and whose services were absolutely essential. In other words, I preferred to lodge a temporary discretion with the Secretary of the Treasury rather than to make a general increase of salaries, which would be too high by and by, and which we could not get rid of. That was the simple ground upon which I put it. I recommended an appropriation of $250,000 with this view while I held the office of Secretary of the Treasury, and recommended it, not to be disbursed by myself, because I did not intend to remain in the office, but to be disbursed by my successor, whoever he might be. I was of the opinion that that was the best thing to do. I consulted the chairman of the Committee on Finance on the part of the Senate, now a member of the committee, as he will remember, on that subject, and I consulted the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of the House, and explained my reasons. They agreed with me, and the appropriation was made. A reason for a similar appropriation, though of a smaller amount, seemed to present itself last year because there had been no increase of salaries, and it was made after considerable discussion.

It is my habit to think that a man placed in a high office, a man of character, who has been found true to integrity and honor during a long life or for many years, may be trusted with the disbursement of a sum of money for ordinary purposes. You must trust somebody. Why not trust him who has risen to such eminence as to fit him for a high place? In principle, as a general practice, I agree, and I stated that I agreed, with the honorable Senator from Illinois; but under the circumstances I deemed it wise to vary from it; and I believe that he is rather a poor statesman who always is bound by the same rules under widely differing circumstances, because he sees a principle in it, not a moral principle, but a political principle if you please. I think that ability is shown in the power to suit yourself to circumstances and do that which varying conditions may require, and not always to be bound down by one iron rule and not to move from it. Sir, these have been remarkable times, and they have required some variation from the ordinary course of things.

It seems the Senate agreed with me. I have not abandoned the idea. I think now that it would be wise to do the same thing rather than to be paying twenty per cent. increase of salaries all round to every officer. It would not take one quarter as much money. We appropriated only $160,000 last year in this way and got along well enough; but your twenty per cent. increase will take a million. I did it on the score of economy. I thought it was better. I think so still. But unfortunately such a state of feeling exists in Congress with reference to political affairs at the present day and the political opinions of the Secretary of the Treasury and other men, that they would rather spend a million according to rule, according to the law they passed, than spend $150,000 through the exercise of the discretion of an officer whose honor is not impugned and cannot be impugned in my judgment.

That is the simple fact; and when I say that the Committee on Finance did not attempt to propose such an appropriation this year I mean to suggest that it was because it was understood that such was the state of feeling that it was impossible to pass it, and therefore they might as well not try it; but I remain of precisely the same opinion that I did then, and I would rather trust $150,000 to the Secretary of the Treasury to be disbursed in that way than to spend $1,000,000 in a general increase of salaries when the great majority of them in my judgment ought not to be increased at all.

So far as that goes I am responsible for these opinions and for having acted upon them; and I do believe—I know that while in disbursing the fund he may have made some mistakes, the Secretary disbursed it throughout upon the principles upon which the appropriation was obtained, according to the reasons which I gave for it in the first place, and to accomplish the very purpose that I wished to carry out. I did not mean that it should be given to all the under clerks, who receive enough, but for a special purpose, to keep that kind of aid in the Department that was needed by the Department. That was the object and the only object.

But it is abandoned, and the question comes back simply to an appropriation of $50,000; for what? To pay temporary clerks. As I said before, these are times when you cannot tell precisely what you want. In ordinary times, before the war, we knew exactly what force was needed; we knew how much business was to be done in the Department; we could fix the number of clerks in each bureau and say "there is enough," and fix their compensation. We cannot do it now, for such is the sudden increase of business in the different bureaus of the Department from month to month that the Secretary of the Treasury must have power to employ temporary clerks more than the ordinary force at different times or he cannot get along.

Mr. SHERMAN. An appropriation for the same purpose was made regularly before the war.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But not to the same amount; this is rather larger than was appropriated then. There has always been a small appropriation to be used at the discretion of the Secretary for temporary clerks. Then there would seem to be no objection to this, and all the terrible shaking ague fit of my friend from Illinois upon that subject is really without any occasion in the atmosphere.

But, sir, it seems there is a wonderful difficulty about the sum of money which there is in the Treasury. Does the honorable Senator know that the Secretary of the Treasury cannot draw from the Treasury a dollar on his own signature at any time except after the warrant on which it is drawn has gone through all the formalities required and has gone through the hands of all the accounting officers of the Treasury? The Secretary of the Treasury cannot take out a sixpence in any way. The ordinary business of the Treasury, I should think, must be pretty well understood here. A claim comes in, a disbursement, something to be done according to a law of Congress. That claim goes through the hands of the auditors and comptrollers, is thoroughly examined, and then a warrant is drawn, certified by all to be correct, and on that warrant thus drawn and these certificates the Secretary of the Treasury can draw the money for that specific purpose, to pay that specific debt, to meet that specific affair, and in no other way. The Secretary of the Treasury cannot sit down and make his draft and take a sixpence out of the Treasury any more than any Senator can; and no Treasurer would pay such a draft; if he did, he would be responsible on his bond. The Secretary has no more power over the money in the Treasury, excepting in the way I speak of, that everything must have his signature before it is drawn, than we have or any one of us has, not a particle.

It seems this money has swelled up to $140,000,000. It has been varying. Did not the Senator from Illinois help to pass the laws which brought this money into the Treasury? Did he not vote for the internal revenue act? Did he not vote for the tariff bills passed before the last one we had up? Is he not in favor of raising internal revenue? Is he not in favor of raising customs revenue to meet the wants of the Government? If he is, and if he has voted for these bills, he is responsible, and not the Secretary of the Treasury or the President of the United States. Congress is responsible for that. How is the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of the money he gets in? All he can do is to pay debts, pay the interest, pay the expenses of the Government; and if there is a balance in the Treasury that is not called for at a particular moment he cannot help it. What does the Senator want him to do with it? He has no power to lend it. He cannot pay off the public with it until the public debt becomes payable. He cannot pay the compound-interest notes until their time is out and they are presented. He cannot pay bonds because the bonds are on time and are not yet due. All he can do is to pay the interest and pay the ordinary expenses of the Government. Is he responsible for the money? What does the Senator wish him to do? Does he wish him to put the gold up at auction and sell what gold there is in the Treasury? Of course he cannot sell the bills. Why, sir, the Senator or his friends from that section of the country particularly are absolutely protesting against taking up all that the Secretary has power to take up, namely, the greenbacks. They are protesting against him paying them off and retaining them in the Treasury. They say he must put them out again, except the $4,000,000 a month which the law authorizes him to retire; and the vote even of the other House calls for the repeal of that provision, and they say he shall not do even that. How can he help the accumulation of money in the Treasury? It will all be needed. If it is not needed at this particular moment, it will be.

What remedy does the Senator propose? It is not enough to get up here and say, "This is all wrong; this is a vast power; this is a tremendous discretion; the liberties of this people are in danger." Why not find some way in which to protect the liberties of this people? Why not propose a remedy? It is very easy to complain, but it requires a different power to provide a remedy. I should like to have the Senator put his ingenuity to work upon that, and see what he would do.

Now, sir, I am unwilling to stand under this kind of imputation, because I conceive that it attacks me as well as others. I have reported bills to raise revenue, internal revenue bills and tariff bills and other bills, and I have done what I could to pass them. In that course I have been sustained by the Senate almost unanimously, and have ordinarily had the support on those bills of the honorable Senator from Illinois, he voting for them. The country required them. The necessities of the day made it absolutely essential that we should pass them. We had vast responsibilities to meet; we must keep the public faith firm; we must sustain the Government. And, sir, because in doing this it happens that on an occasion there are rather a few more millions in the Treasury than at another time, and perhaps more than can be used at the present hour, and yet all of which will be needed to meet our obligations, are we to be told that this is an immense danger against which the country is to be warned? The money must be somewhere, under the control of somebody; and our institutions are such as require that there should be a head of the Finance Department of the United States, and that in his hands in one sense—that is, under his control—should be the money that happens to be on hand in order to meet the exigencies of the Government. Now, sir, I do not see the danger. I do not think that the Senator can find anything particularly alarming about it. I see nothing of that kind. I am very glad that we have so much power to meet our obligations; I hope it will continue, but I fear that too soon the Senator will find that the Government will need all its resources.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, I am sorry that we cannot discuss a matter of this kind without allusions to the personal views of Senators any further than as they are connected with the public service. In what I said when up before I endeavored to confine my remarks entirely to what I conceived to be public matters, and to avoid making any unkind reflection upon any member of the Senate, any allusion to him as possessing all the wisdom of the body or not possessing it. I spoke of what I regarded to be an evil, which was the vesting of unnecessary discretionary authority in the heads of Departments. I spoke of it as an evil, very bad economy, and a thing which was dangerous to the liberties of the people, that such a vast amount of money should be left in the hands of anybody.

Now, sir, if I am asked whether I did not vote to raise revenue, I answer most certainly. If I am inquired whether I am in favor of raising revenue, I answer most assuredly. I am asked to devise a way to deplete the Treasury, and I am told that there is a clamor from the western country against curtailment. If times are hard, if money is scarce, if people are pinched, why not disburse some of these millions that have lain in the Treasury for the last year?

Mr. FESSENDEN. How? In what way?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I look to the Senator at the head of the Finance Committee, who has charge of these matters, to devise the way. I have expressed my opinion that it ought to be done, and I shall be most happy to follow him, as he says I did in voting for the bills to raise revenue, when he brings in a practical measure, as I have no doubt he will when he moves in it, to deplete the Treasury of this unnecessary amount of money there. I have called his attention and the attention of the Senate to it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will inform the Senator that there is no way of doing it that I know of except two. One is to pay off the public debt as it becomes due, and you cannot pay it any faster than it becomes due, and meet the ordinary expenses of the Government. The other one I suppose which the Senator would advise, perhaps, would be to deposit it among the States as we did the surplus revenue some twenty or thirty years ago; divide it around.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not know why the Senator has a right to assume that I would wish to deposit it with the States.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not assume any such thing. I am merely stating the only two ways I know of to do what the Senator wants.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Well, it seems to me that the Senator from Maine, if he was owing $2,500,000,000, and had in his vaults in his house $142,000,000, could find some way by which he could get rid of his $142,000,000 and lessen his indebtedness to that extent, and cease paying interest upon it.

I was told that I was mistaken as to the amount of money in the Treasury. I had not looked into the tables recently; I had only general recollection; but since I was up before I have sent for the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the finances, and I find that he reports as cash in the Treasury on the 30th day of June last $132,000,000, and on the 31st of October last $130,000,000. So I was not far out of the way. There has been more than one hundred million dollars in the Treasury since the 30th of June last, and I think during the whole twelve months last past.

Now, sir, I do think that some measure should be taken on this subject before we adjourn. I look to the Senator from Maine, the chairman of the Finance Committee, charged particularly with this business, to bring forward a measure by which a portion of this money shall be taken out of the Treasury, and we shall cease to pay interest on that much of our indebtedness.

Mr. President, I recollect the time, and it will appear by the official reports, that we were giving certificates of deposit for money deposited in the Treasury, and paying interest upon it when we had tens of millions in the Treasury. I think the relief to the country which it wants is to be found in disbursing this money. You have $142,000,000 in the Treasury. Throw out $100,000,000 of it, pay off some of your indebtedness, instead of issuing new indebtedness for it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will ask how we can pay it before it becomes payable?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Does not the Senator know that millions of it have been paid into the Treasury the last year, and that you have issued new indebtedness for it?

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is only changing one form of indebtedness for another.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I know it is; but instead of changing one form of indebtedness for another why not pay money for it?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Because those who hold it had a right by law to exchange it and preferred to do so. That is the reason. Our law gave them the privilege of exchanging those securities for others, and they preferred to do it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We are devising means, and I presume we shall have a bill this session to exchange one kind of indebtedness for another that is becoming due. I have seen it stated—I do not know that the committee have taken any action here, and I do not know that they propose any—but I have seen it stated within a few days somewhere that the compound-interest notes which are to fall due the coming year are to be replaced with another species of indebtedness that is to bear interest. Why not pay them off whenever they become due and scatter the money among the people?

The Senator from Maine smiles at this. I think some way can be found. It is a very strange state of things to me that there is no possible way to relieve the Treasury of money that is in its vaults. The House of Representatives has passed a bill this very session for selling the gold, and the Senator from Maine—I did not mean to say a word about the Senator from Maine, and I will not now say it—but the Finance Committee has reported here against that bill, as I understand. It seems that the House of Representatives was for taking some step in that direction. I do not know that that is a proper bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Allow me to ask the Senator a question?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Certainly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the gold were sold what would it be sold for? Sold for money, of course. Then what would you do with the money? Would not that go into the Treasury and be in the Treasury in the same way?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Pay off your compound-interest notes as they fall due.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They are not payable yet.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Pay then when due.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But we must keep the money for that purpose when they are due. The Senator wants to scatter it before that.

Mr. TRUMBULL. They fall due very soon.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But we must keep money to pay them with.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There have been debts falling due. We have paid off hundreds of millions of debts that were due within the last two years.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Of course they were due.

Mr. TRUMBULL. You could pay them off with the money you had; but instead of paying them with money, you issued other indebtedness for them. Does not the Senator know it? You were not bound to do that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It was because we could not help it. They had a right to demand other indebtedness.

Mr. TRUMBULL. They had no right to demand it. I take issue, as a matter of fact, with the Senator from Maine. We have paid hundreds of millions of money deposited in the Treasury on certificates for which they had no right to demand bonds.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There were no bonds given for certificates.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Very well; then I am right that there was an indebtedness which we could pay.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Exactly; and I say to the Senator that we have paid all our indebtedness just as it became due, but we cannot pay what is not due.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I say to the Senator from Maine that we have paid indebtedness that was due, and that we had a right to pay, by issuing bonds for it.

Mr. SUMNER. Let me remind my friend from Illinois that the bill for the sale of gold to which he refers, which has passed the other House, provides that compound-interest notes may be received in payment for the gold.

Mr. BROWN. Or bonds either.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Or bonds either. That would certainly provide a way.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But they would not be obliged to pay for the gold with compound-interest notes; and what then? The holders of the compound-interest notes are not obliged to bring them in till they become due, and even then they need not do it if they choose to hold them without drawing interest.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We do not care how much indebtedness they hold that draws no interest. I reckon creditors will not hold that very long, and we can afford then to keep money in our Treasury, but we cannot afford to do it when we are paying interest on it. It is a mistake if the Senator from Maine means to say to the country, and I should like to know if he means the statement to go out to the country upon his responsibility as a Senator and the head of the Finance Committee, that no species of indebtedness has matured against the Government which we had a right to pay off at maturity, if we had the money to pay it, and for which the holders of the indebtedness had no right to demand other securities.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator is aware of any I should like to have him state it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I understand that there has been such indebtedness.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to know what it is.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think certificates of deposit.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They have been paid. There have not been any bonds issued for them.

Mr. TRUMBULL. For none of them?

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator says no bonds were issued for these certificates of deposit that were taken up, I hope he is correct. I will not say that he is not, because I have not examined it; but my understanding is that we have taken up millions of compound-interest notes during the past year; and I do not understand that the holders of compound-interest notes have a right to demand bonds for them. Am I wrong?

Mr. FESSENDEN. If they have been taken up they have been paid. I do not think any bonds have been issued for compound-interest notes.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then there is an indebtedness which has been falling due, which is maturing now, and which we have a right to pay off as soon as it matures.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What is that?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The compound-interest notes.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well. I say to the Senator we shall have that right when they become due, but that time has not arrived.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Has none of that indebtedness matured?

Mr. FESSENDEN. None of it yet to my knowledge.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Much of it has come in: the Secretary's report shows that he has received millions.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Some of it has been taken up by consent, I suppose. I do not know that any of it is really payable yet.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is soon to mature, whether it has matured or not; and that will afford a means of paying out the money in the Treasury Department when it does fall due, and it certainly falls due within the coming year, some of it, if it is not already due. I thought some of it had already matured.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is true that indebtedness becomes due, most of it, in the course of the following year; but there is a loud call throughout the country everywhere, more especially from the Senator's own region, not to pay that off, but to substitute something in its place in order that the banks may hold it, and not make a severe, and what it is apprehended may be, a very disastrous contraction of the currency. These notes can be paid and will be paid by the Treasury as they become payable, but not if you take all the money out and distribute it as the honorable Senator wants, because then there would be nothing to pay with.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have not proposed to take the money out.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If it is kept in the Treasury that course will be taken up. But Congress is protesting, and the people of the country, more especially in the Senator's region, are protesting that it will not do to contract the currency by paying these notes off; that you must substitute something for them in order to keep up the circulation. That is a question that the Senator will be called to act upon, and when the question comes before him we shall see how he decides it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not wish a contraction that is to paralyze the interests of the country. I do not understand that philosophy. I know but little about finance, I admit; but I cannot see for the life of me how it contracts the currency if the holder of a thousand-dollar compound-interest note brings it up to the Treasury and takes out a thousand dollars that is locked up there, and scatters it among the people.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will tell the Senator there are $100,000,000 of these notes held by the banks to form the basis of their credit. Now, if they are deprived of these notes, and they are taken in, it contracts the currency just as much as if you took so many greenbacks out of circulation. The question is simple enough and every body understands it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. How it contracts the currency when you pay out greenbacks for them I cannot see. You have got $45,000,000 of greenbacks in the Treasury to-day, have you not? They have been lying there for a year.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Suppose these compound-interest notes are paid off, as they will be when the time comes; they must be replaced with something. If you provide nothing more to replace them, they will be replaced with greenbacks. That is all they can be replaced with, and so many greenbacks will be taken out of circulation and held by the banks.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Will it contract the currency any more to have the banks hold them than it does to have the Treasury hold them? The Treasury has held them for a year.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They will not be in circulation.

Mr. TRUMBULL. They are not much in circulation when they are in the Treasury. You have had $180,000,000 there for a year. Who has seen that money? Has it helped the commerce of the country? Who is benefited by having ninety odd millions of gold lying in the Treasury, and forty or fifty millions of greenbacks? That is what makes the contraction, because you are hoarding up this money in the Treasury and keeping it there. I do not see how it produces any contraction when you take up a compound-interest note, which does not circulate as money, and pay out for it something that will circulate among the people as money. I do not understand the philosophy of it I confess.

I had no intention of being betrayed into a discussion in regard to these compound-interest notes and the various kinds of indebtedness; I had a general knowledge of them. The Senator from Maine undertook to impute to me the possession of all the wisdom of the Senate, and from the manner in which he said it the impression was that he disputed the facts which I had stated. Since I have been speaking there has been handed to me a statement, which I presume to be correct, that we have issued $266,000,000 of compound-interest notes, and we have already redeemed $123,000,000 of them.

Mr. CONNESS. Was it not a good thing to do?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, excellent; and I want to redeem the others and pay out the money.

Mr. CATTELL. Those redeemed have fallen due and been presented for payment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am very glad to know that, because that meets the precise point made upon me by the Senator from Maine.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What was that?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The compound-interest notes have fallen due, the Senator from New Jersey says, $123,000,000 of them, and been presented for payment. Then there was a way.

Mr. CATTELL. My answer is, that all that have fallen due have been presented and paid. The compound-interest notes were issued at different dates, some payable in two years, some in a longer time; $140,000,000 of them are not yet due.

Mr. TRUMBULL. But there is a portion already due.

Mr. CATTELL. And that portion has been paid.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is the precise fact which I am glad to know, and I am very much obliged to the Senator from New Jersey for communicating it. Then it seems I was quite correct in the statement that I made.

But, sir, I do not desire to prolong this discussion. I hope that before we adjourn some measure will be devised, and one that will not unnecessarily contract the currency. I wish certainly not to do anything that will embarrass the commercial interests of the country; but I do wish such legislation as will prevent hereafter such an accumulation of money in the Treasury. I think that may be done safely to the country and to its commercial interests, and that will be an economical measure if we could devise some mode to accomplish it.

Mr. SHERMAN. This is rather a singular debate to grow out of an amendment which everybody will vote for. I presume there is not a member in the Senate who does not see the necessity of adopting the amendment reported by the committee. The amount appropriated here for temporary clerks is less than has been appropriated during the whole war. I have before me the first appropriation made for this purpose during the war. The amount then appropriated was $110,000, and the appropriation was almost in the very language contained in the pending amendment. It read as follows:

"For temporary clerks in the Treasury Department for the year ending June 30, 1863, $110,000: Provided, That the Secretary be, and he is hereby, authorized in his discretion to classify the temporary clerks so authorized according to the character of their services, and assign to such of them as he shall see fit any compensation not exceeding that of clerks of the first class."

This appropriation was made May 20, 1862, and has been continued every year from that time. Why it was omitted in the House during the present session I cannot answer; but I am told that it grew out of a misunderstanding as to the purpose of the appropriation. Appropriations in the same language for much larger amounts have been made during the war. Before the war an appropriation was always made for extra clerk hire. The last one made during a year when the expenses of the Government was very closely scrutinized, 1860, was $12,000. This is an item of appropriation that has been continued for years.

Mr. President, one or two statements were made by the Senator from Illinois which rather astonished me. He seems to think that the amount in the Treasury is so large as to justify a suspicion that it is held for improper purposes, or at least that it is so large as to excite comment. Now, let us see. The amount of currency held in the Treasury Department, according to the statement laid on our tables, is $45,069,187. Of that there is to-day liable to be called upon at any moment $15,791,454, making the actual amount of currency in the Treasury now $29,277,733. That is the total amount of the money in the Treasury subject to order. That is about one month's receipts of the Internal Revenue Bureau, or one twelfth of the annual income of the Treasury from internal revenue.

I presume that it would be very unwise to hold a less balance than $30,000,000 at any one time. I do not believe the ordinary operations of the Treasury could be carried on with less than one month's receipts of internal revenue. This money is deposited in various places all over the country, from Boston to San Francisco, in the course of collecting the internal revenue, and I believe that an amount equal to this is found to be necessary to carry on the operations of the Treasury. The drafts of the Treasury Department on the banks go through various bureaus of the Treasury, and it requires at least one month in some cases to make the necessary returns, so that it seems to me the balance of currency on hand is not too large.

In regard to the balance of gold, I may say that at the last session we passed an act on my own motion fixing the limit of gold at $60,000,000. The amount of gold in the Treasury is $77,000,000. The Senator said $97,000,000, but he will find from this same statement that near twenty million dollars of that amount is held for individuals, which does not belong to the Government. That is now deposited in the sub-Treasury at New York for the use of individuals. For that money so deposited gold certificates are issued. It is not the money of the Government; but to facilitate transactions in gold that money is deposited there and certificates are issued, and they are counted as gold. It does not belong to the Treasury, because it belongs to private individuals, and is liable to be called for at any moment. The balance of gold in the Treasury is only $77,361,623.

The Senator from Maine made a remark which I thought probably might mislead, although unintentionally so on his part, and that is, that this money could not be applied in the ordinary course of business of the Treasury Department to the payment of the debt. Under the law the Secretary of the Treasury has the undoubted power, and he has been exercising that power for months, to buy up and buy in the compound-interest notes, and the most of those notes that have been bought in before they were due were bought under the authority given by law. During the recent stringency in the money market in New York some twenty million dollars, if I remember the amount correctly, at any rate many millions, of compound-interest notes were taken up at par and the accrued interest, because currency was suddenly demanded; there was a pressure for currency, and the bankers and other persons who held compound-interest notes called for the money, and in pursuance of an order of the Secretary of the Treasury I think about twenty million dollars were paid out to the holders of compound-interest notes. This could be done now.

But the question arises, whether it would be wise in the present condition of our money affairs to reduce the balance of gold in the Treasury. That is a rather serious question. I doubt myself whether it would be wise to reduce the volume of gold in the Treasury. I have shown already that the amount of currency is not very large, not more than one month's income from internal revenue, and that that balance is necessary to carry on the operations of the Treasury. No bank would be considered safe that did not keep at least about one third of its aggregate indebtedness in currency. The national banks are required by the law creating them to keep two fifths and in some cases one half of the full amount of their deposits and circulation on hand all the time in legal-tender currency. The Government of the United States is paying out annually $300,000,000, collected from internal revenue, and the balance now on hand subject to these calls is less than $30,000,000. Certainly that is not too large a balance. Senators ought not to use language which may lead the public at large to think the Secretary of the Treasury is for some improper purpose holding large sums of money, when the actual balance in hand is probably not more than enough to carry on the operations of the Treasury.

As to whether he ought to sell the gold and pay off the compound-interest notes before they become due, that is a very doubtful question, indeed. It is necessary to keep a very large balance of gold on hand in anticipation of a falling off of the revenue. Every commercial man anticipates that, during the next six or eight months, there will be a considerable falling off in the gold revenue on account of the large importations which have been heretofore made, and he has got to provide for the contingency of a falling off of the gold revenue. Perhaps $77,000,000 is too much. We at the last session provided that $60,000,000 of gold should be kept on hand, and all above that should be sold. If the Senator then was of the opinion that the balance could be reduced to less than $60,000,000 he certainly ought to have made his opinion known, but we heard no complaint at that time. It was then believed to be necessary always to keep on hand a half year's supply of gold in order to pay the interest on the public debt, and I believe that is little enough to be kept on hand. It is true the Government loses the interest on the gold, but it must lose that in order to avoid a possible contingency of the falling off of the gold revenue, so as to be prepared, at all events, to pay the interest on the public debt.

In regard to the gold bill which passed the other day in the House of Representatives, I was perfectly willing, as my friend from Maine knows, to vote for that bill, not because I thought it had any virtue, or that it could do any good, but simply because it could do no harm, and it might satisfy the public mind. The committee thought best to report against it, and I have no complaint to make. But what was that bill? That bill did not require the selling of a dollar of gold. If that bill had required the sale of a portion of this gold it would have had some operation. That bill simply provided that in case the Secretary of the Treasury did sell gold he should sell it in a particular way; that he should advertise six days and give public notice in the newspapers in New York that on a certain day he intended to sell some millions of dollars in gold. It did not compel him to sell gold or to apply gold in the payment or purchase of the debt, but simply provided that in case he did sell the gold he should sell it by public auction.

The objection to that bill was that when he gave six days' notice that at a certain time he would sell a million or two million dollars of gold the result would be that a combination would be made among the gold brokers suddenly to reduce the price, and then the very moment it was sold they would raise the price until he was compelled to sell again.

Another objection that was urged very strongly to the House bill, about the defeat of which the Senator complains, is that it did not provide for the sale of this gold—did not contemplate its sale. On the contrary, the House voted down a proposition which required the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the gold. The House refused to take upon itself the responsibility of compelling the sale of gold.

It seems to me that under these circumstances there is no just ground of complaint; but this matter has been lugged into the debate and the public mind is peculiarly sensitive to everything that affects our finances, because there is a stringency in the money market and times are somewhat hard all over the country.

The Senator has drawn in a proposition which is not yet pending before the Senate, and which, I think, he ought not to have anticipated the discussion of, and that is the proposition, which has been mentioned in the papers, to give authority to issue $100,000,000 of four per cent. certificates. Let me ask the Senator from Illinois how the Secretary of the Treasury can pay the compound-interest notes which mature from May till December? How would you do it? Would you borrow money at six per cent. interest in gold to do it? The Senator perhaps will say that he would take the money on hand. I have shown that the currency on hand is not available for that purpose, because to carry on the operations of the Treasury the Secretary must have at least the amount of one month's ordinary receipts and expenditures on hand.

Would you sell gold in order to pay the compound-interest notes, and if so to what extent? You could not sell more than twenty or thirty millions; nobody proposes such a thing, because according to the judgment of all men you must keep four or five or six months supply on hand in order to meet the contingency of a falling off of gold revenue. How would you pay the compound-interest notes as they mature? You have got to provide for them. There is only one way of providing for them, either by the issue of greenbacks, which is an inflation of the currency to a large extent, or by the issue of a five-twenty gold-bearing interest bond, or by the issue of some other form of security. You have not got the money to pay them in any other way. It is a simple proposition, that you have got to resort to some mode of that kind unless you have got the money on hand to pay them. You must borrow the money, and borrow it on the most favorable terms possible.

I think I have said enough to prevent the remarks of the Senator from Illinois making an undue impression upon the public mind, to the effect that a large amount of money is held here idle uselessly while we are borrowing and paying large sums in the way of interest for money. It seems to me that complaint cannot fairly be made, that at all events the exigencies of the Treasury will require at least the present amount of currency to be kept always on hand. The amount, I believe, is as low as it has been for a long time, I cannot say how long, because I do not like to speak positively without the figures before me; but at least a month's income and expenditure should be kept on hand in currency subject to order at any moment; and it must be remembered, too, that the Treasury is now paying out a very large sum for bounties, an unforeseen and extraordinary expenditure. Some money must be kept on hand to meet the bounties. All these payments are made by drafts; and it is often the case that the amount on hand, as shown by the tables, is larger than the real balance, because of outstanding drafts not yet presented for payment and not deducted from the cash on hand.

There are many reasons, then, why the currency balance cannot be materially lessened, and I have already stated why the gold balance cannot be materially lessened, and why it is necessary to keep at least fifty or sixty million dollars of gold on hand. From the statement laid upon our table, it is impossible to meet the compound-interest notes which are maturing from May until December to the amount of $140,000,000 unless either we issue greenbacks, which the Senator does not advocate, and which, I suppose, no one would advocate, or unless you issue five-twenty bonds and sell them, or unless you issue some other form of security or resort to some other mode of raising money. I will not anticipate the discussion of the proposition that may come from the Committee on Finance on that point. I only make these remarks to prevent what I conceived an erroneous impression in regard to the present condition of the Treasury.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I simply wish to state to my friend that he misapprehended my remark. I was aware of the power of the Secretary of the Treasury, but there is no power to compel the holders of the compound-interest notes to bring them in for redemption.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly not.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They may hold them to the end. What I said was, when they became payable and were presented they could be paid, but the holder is not obliged to present them before.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Secretary of the Treasury can go into the open market and buy them.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not desire to prolong this discussion, but I think the statement made by the Senator from Ohio may have the same effect which he supposed some remarks I made might have; that is, to mislead the public. He says, and truly says, that it is necessary to have on hand a considerable amount of money; he thinks an amount equal to one month's revenue and disbursement, which he estimates, I believe, at about thirty millions. Why is it necessary to have a fund on hand? It is to meet outstanding indebtedness. If there is no indebtedness to come, there is no necessity to have this fund on hand; and this statement shows that we have $45,000,000 of currency on hand; and it shows also, as the Senator truly says, that there is an indebtedness which has matured equal to some $15,000,000. The reason we have to have a large surplus on hand is to meet contingencies of that kind, but this shows an amount—

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator will see that the debt matured to the amount of $15,791,000, not presented for payment, is debt that may be called for at any moment. Perhaps drafts are out now which have passed all the accounting officers and may be at any moment presented to the Treasury.

Mr. TRUMBULL. So I stated, and that will be the case at the end of the next month, and the end of the next month after that, and so on. It will always be so that there will be checks drawn which will not be presented at the moment the statement is made up. I suppose that is always so. Now, let me ask the Senator from Ohio whether that is not the very reason why it is necessary to have a surplus to some extent all the time to meet just that class of cases?

Mr. SHERMAN. In cases of sudden panic these balances are at one reduced. I have no doubt that an exact statement would show that during the recent trouble in New York all those outstanding drafts, &c., which were available were presented and paid. The Senator is aware probably a voucher or draft on the Treasury is held by an individual in the form of a convenient deposit. It may be held for a month or two months, but the moment money is greatly in demand all those things are thrown upon the Treasury Department and demanded at once just like the deposits of a bank.

Mr. TRUMBULL. So I understand. We are perfectly agreed about that. They will be presented when there is a panic, and hence the necessity of having a fund on hand to meet them when they come in that way, and we have got $45,000,000 just for that purpose. It is $45,000,000, then, shown to be on hand, and when you have brought in every cent that has been drawn on the Treasury you have got nearly thirty million dollars left that there can be no demand upon. The reason we have to have a fund is to meet that class of cases; so that the statement, as I think, that the Senator makes, that we really must have a fund of $29,000,000 on hand when we do not owe anything and there is no liability whatever, I think is not correct. I think that is calculated to mislead. But the reason we must have a surplus on hand is to meet the very state of things which he says, and we have got that surplus of $45,000,000. Of course if there can be no indebtedness come the Senator from Ohio does not want to hold $29,000,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have already stated that fifteen or sixteen millions of this balance is already held not subject to draft because it is already drawn against. The balance of thirty millions is held always to draw against. Let me take the case that is actually occurring this day. The payments of the Treasury now are largely in excess of the receipts. That is shown by comparison of the two statements. Why? Simply because now they are meeting extraordinary demands made upon the Treasury Department, and the receipts have fallen off; so that, in the present state of affairs, in two or three months this balance would all be gone. Why? The receipts, as you see by the daily papers, of internal revenue have fallen off, and probably will not increase again until the income tax comes in. Then there are extraordinary demands made by payment of bounties, by the expenditures of Congress, by the civil list, and by many other causes. Thus this balance is fluctuating backward and forward; but by the ordinary operation of the Treasury Department the balance will disappear in two or three months, simply because at certain seasons of the year there are greater demands than receipts, and it would be an idle thing for the Treasury of the United States always to run so close that it could not pay its ordinary expenditures, that it must borrow money in order to meet ordinary expenditure. It must have a working balance, as bankers call it, sufficient at least, according to the usual estimate, to one month's expenditure. That has been shown by the custom of the Department and the habit of the Government.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I agree with the Senator, there must be a working balance; but what I insist is, that $45,000,000 is not necessary, and I insist that the statement shows that much to be there, and that the object of that balance is to meet these outstanding obligations, that may come in at any moment; and if there were no outstanding obligations and could not be any, then you would not want any balance at all. The very object of this balance is to meet just that state of things.

Now, as to the gold: no contingency of this kind arises as to the gold. You know exactly how much gold you have got to pay out and when you have got to pay it. You know that precisely. There can be no extraordinary demand on your gold deposit. Why then keep in your Treasury, as I stated it, $97,000,000, or as the Senator has it, by subtracting nineteen or twenty million dollars that is on deposit, some seventy-seven or seventy-eight million dollars? You know exactly how much gold you have got to pay; but the Senator says you must keep on hand all the time at least half the amount of gold you have got to pay out in a year, when you know exactly what it is. I cannot give my consent to any such proposition as that. You have got in your Treasury to-day more gold than can be called for in the next nine months, I do not know but twelve; certainly more than there can be any call for in nine months.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator is entirely mistaken, he does not wish to deceive. There are $77,000,000 on hand, according to this statement. Then there are $15,779,000 of maturing bonds that will mature this year, most of them, or early next year. That is within the year. Then, beside that, the annual amount of gold required to pay the interest on the public debt is now something like $90,000,000, and will be as soon as the seven-thirties are funded, $131,000,000. I showed that the other day. Then there are the foreign expenditures of the Government which are paid in gold, and money to fulfill treaty stipulations and other things paid in gold, which must be provided for out of this fund. The whole sum, including the maturing debt, that will be required in gold for one year from this date will not be less than $155,000,000.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have not gone into the statement of which the Senator speaks, of the amount required for the year. I spoke of what was required for nine months, and said that I thought we had more gold on hand now than would be required for the next nine months. The Senator meets that by saying we shall require $155,000,000 for the next year. I looked over the Senator's remarks the other day casually, not as carefully as I ought to have done, and I thought he estimated the amount required for the next year at $140,000,000. Am I mistaken?

Mr. SHERMAN. Without counting the $15,000,000 of maturing bonds.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Is that not embraced in that statement?

Mr. SHERMAN. I said that that amount would have to be paid out of the balance on hand.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not give my assent to any such statement, that it is necessary to have on hand one half the amount of interest that we shall owe during the year. We did not do that in olden times, when we owed a debt formerly.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Allow me to make an inquiry of the Senator. He is now discussing a question of a good deal of interest to the country, and one upon which I have bestowed some thought. I should like to have the benefit of his investigations upon it. It seems that there has accumulated in the Treasury, according to his statement, $97,000,000, according to the statement of the Senator from Ohio $77,000,000 of gold. What does he propose that the Secretary of the Treasury shall do with that accumulation? I think it is too large. Now, what does the Senator from Illinois say that under existing laws the Secretary of the Treasury ought to do with that precise sum of money?

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is a question that I have not yet bestowed sufficient attention upon to answer satisfactorily to myself.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then I regret that I asked the question. Inasmuch as the Senator felt himself authorized now for two hours to criticize the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to the management of the money on hand, I thought of course he would relieve my judgment of the embarrassment under which I have been laboring.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am sorry that the Senator from Indiana has so imperfectly understood me as to say, and repeat in the Senate what I believe has been stated by some before, that I have been assailing the Secretary of the Treasury. I call upon the Senator from Indiana to repeat one word I have said censuring the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senate was considering the question whether we should give to the Secretary of the Treasury the discretionary disposal of $50,000 in the payment of clerk hire. While we were considering that question the Senator felt it to be his duty, in very emphatic terms, to call the attention of the Senate and of the country to the fact that there was an accumulation of money in the Treasury dangerous to the liberty of the people, $97,000,000 of which was in gold and $45,000,000 in paper; and he went so far as to estimate the gold in the paper currency and to make it in all about one hundred and seventy million dollars, which he said had accumulated in the Treasury. Now, I want to know of the Senator for what purpose he introduced that argument before the Senate? The Senate was considering just one question, and that question was made mainly upon the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts, based upon an anonymous letter, that the Secretary of the Treasury was not to be trusted with the discretionary control of $50,000 of money. That was the question. In connection with that question the Senator from Illinois went into a discussion of the condition of the Treasury, especially with regard to the accumulation of money in the Treasury. Now, if it had no connection with the Secretary of the Treasury's management of the affairs of his Department, what logical connection had it with the business before the Senate?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, I suppose it will be no part of my business to undertake to furnish to the Senator from Indiana the understanding of my remarks; but I regret that that astute Senator does not see the difference between the discussion of a general principle and its application to a particular individual. If I were to rise in the Senate to-day and denounce despotism, do I thereby charge despotism upon every officer in this Government? Suppose I say in my place, as I did to-day, that it is dangerous to have such a large amount of money in the hands of any man—that was my language; I did not say of the present Secretary particularly; I said of any man; and I wish to ask the Senator from Indiana if he will have the candor to answer it, if he does not regard it as dangerous to the liberties of any people to have placed in any man's hands $170,000,000 of money or $140,000,000 of money to remain there permanently where he has the power to dispose of it?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Does the Senator wish a reply now?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator may reply now or at any other time, as he pleases.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, if existing laws will allow the Secretary of the Treasury to use the money for any improper purpose, then I should say that the locking up of that amount of money in the Treasury under his control would be dangerous to the liberties of the country; but when I consider the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury cannot take from the Treasury one single dollar except in pursuance of law, that he has no more control of it than any one Senator, as has been stated by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Finance, I am not able to see that the Secretary's control of that money is dangerous to the country.

In the discussion upon the tariff bill I felt it to be my duty to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that there had accumulated, as I then stated, $93,000,000 of gold in the Treasury, and therefore I objected to legislation which was likely to increase the amount in the Treasury from foreign importations. That was the argument I presented. I thought the fact that there had been such an accumulation was for the consideration of the legislative department of the Government. The Senator, when that bill was up, did not feel it to be his duty to make use of this fact with a view to influence legislation. But this morning, when we are considering the conduct of the Secretary of the Treasury in the management of a fund at his discretion, the distinguished Senator brings this subject up.

Now, I do not believe myself that even the Congress is so very responsible about this matter. It seems to me to be very difficult for the wisest men of the country to anticipate the amount of money that will be brought into the Treasury by a particular law. Under the present law year before last the receipts of gold were $84,000,000, and this last year $170,000,000. I will not say that the distinguished gentlemen connected with the Finance Committee are responsible for this. A law that one year brings into the Treasury but $84,000,000 and another year brings in $170,000,000 produces a result that could not be anticipated; and I will not say that those Senators who were instrumental in securing the passage of that law are in fault that the law brings in too much. But now, that we do know it, there are two questions: first, what is the duty of Congress? I think the duty of Congress is to change the law so as to reduce the amount that shall be brought into the Treasury; and if the Senator can answer the question which I suggested to him a little bit ago, what does he want, under existing laws, the Secretary of the Treasury to do with the $97,000,000 of gold, it will be a satisfaction to the business community.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not quite agree with the Senator from Indiana that it is safe to lodge unnecessary power in any man's hands, even though you have a law to regulate it. I believe it to be dangerous to the liberties of any people to put their whole keeping and the power over them in the hands of any man or set of men, though there may be a law to regulate his or their conduct. Men may be found who will disregard the law. Most despotisms have been established because there has been power in the hands of the men who established them, vested legally there at the commencement, which they have used illegally for the purpose of establishing the despotism.

But the Senator from Indiana can see no sort of danger in vesting any amount of money and all power in the hands of a single person, provided you have a law that declares he shall not use that power except in a given way. Sir, I do not agree with him, and he rises in his place here and rebukes me, administers to me a rebuke in the Senate because I object to vesting discretionary power unnecessarily in the hands of any man, though you regulate it by law. He rebukes me for making that objection unless I am prepared with a financial scheme to enlighten him and the country as to how the finances of the country are to be regulated hereafter.

When he rebuked me, as he attempted to do, I said to him that I was not prepared to lay down the precise scheme by which the Treasury should be depleted; but am I not to be permitted in my place here to object to a measure as an improper one, and to call the attention of the Senate to it unless (when it is not a matter with which I am specially charged) I can point out to the Senator from Indiana the precise remedy? Can I not speak of an evil and show that it is an evil, and call the attention of the Senate and of the country to it, in order that we may have the benefit of the action of the committee charged with that branch of the public service, and have the benefit of the thought of the country in ascertaining what is best to be done?

Sir I do not understand my duties here as the Senator from Indiana does. I think it was perfectly proper for me to object to the keeping of this large amount of money in the Treasury, and to call the attention of the Senate to it, although I might not be prepared in a debate which has sprung up here at this time to lay down the precise means of depleting the Treasury. I had stated, and if the Senator from Indiana had thought proper to listen to me he could not but have heard that I stated long ago, that I would use this money to pay the debt we owed. I see no difficulty in using the money to pay the debt. The Senator from Ohio has shown you that more than one hundred million dollars of the compound-interest notes fall due during the current year. The Senator from New Jersey has told you that we have already taken up more than a hundred million dollars that have already fallen due.

What is the difficulty in taking the money you have got and paying these notes as far as the surplus will go? I see none. That is one way. Another way by reducing the taxes. I think we are collecting too much. I hope to see the internal revenue taxes reduced and burdens taken off from the people. That will be one way of preventing accumulation hereafter; but as we have got the accumulation, I think there are ways enough by which we can get rid of it, although I do not feel myself called upon to devise a plan, nor do I consider myself subject to the censure of the Senator from Indiana or anybody else when I object to this accumulation and do not at the same time present a plan by which to get rid of the accumulation.

So much for the Senator from Indiana. I have no disposition to prolong this debate. I have been led into saying much more than I intended to say. The few remarks which I made in reference to the amendment which is under consideration, were directed to this one point: the impropriety of vesting discretionary power in public officers. I know that to some extent this is unavoidable; but I think it unwise legislation to vest discretion where it can be avoided; hence I made the remarks I did in regard to this proposition. I do not expect, as at present advised, to vote against it, because I understand from those who have this particular matter in charge that this is necessary and unavoidable.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, as an Indianan the result of this debate is very gratifying to me. The distinguished Secretary of the Treasury is a citizen of the State of Indiana. He and I have never been of the same political party; but allow me to say that he did not come to the Secretaryship of the Treasury without a well-established reputation; a reputation very well known to my colleague and myself, and I think I may say known to the whole country. At the head of the State banking system of our State he so conducted its affairs as to promote the prosperity of the people, to promote their commerce, and to secure to them all the while a most reliable currency. He did not come to that Department upon any political reputation that is oftentimes obtained without very high merit, but he came there as a representative in some sense of the business men of this country, and I believe to-day that he is entitled to the confidence of the business men and the people of this country.

Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois has spoken of the rebuke that I gave him. What rebuke, sir? For two hours he has been arraigning somebody, as I thought, about the accumulations in the Treasury; exactly who we could not tell. Now he says that he felt it to be his duty to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that there had been so much money accumulated in the Treasury. Is it a rebuke that when the Senator was discussing that question I asked him a very plain one, that if he found fault with this condition of affairs how he could get away from it, that I asked him the straight question what it was the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to do with this $97,000,000 of gold? He did not bring it into the Treasury; he did not enact the law which brings it there.

All that he can do is to expend money according to law; and expending money according to law this day, under existing laws, we find in the Treasury $97,000,000 of gold—too much, as I think. There would have been some great value in the Senator's criticism if he had told us what to do with that gold. I am not much in favor of going into the New York market every month or two and selling fifteen or twenty millions of gold, disturbing the prices of all the property of the country, thereby stimulating prices for a few days—a stimulation which is to be followed by a depression a few days afterward.

What shall we do, I ask the Senator, with the gold in the Treasury? What shall the Secretary do? We are discussing him, the discretion that we shall allow him, and upon that question the Senator brings to the attention of the country the present condition of the Treasury; and I ask him under existing law what the Secretary of the Treasury shall do with that money? He speaks of the danger to the liberty of the country because there is so much money in the Treasury. How are we to avoid that? I will ask the Senator. Shall we not collect through a tariff and through the internal taxes enough money to meet the public obligations? The Secretary of the Treasury is to have, to some extent, under his control during the course of the year above $400,000,000. If you had told the people a few years ago that there ever was to pass through the Treasury in the course of a year $400,000,000 they would have been astonished. Perhaps persons of more sensitive nerves than the Senator from Illinois would have been frightened at the prospect for the liberty of the country. But we must have it; it must be collected; it must be paid out; and we must trust somebody.

Who is the responsible man? In some sense the Secretary of the Treasury is a responsible man; but, Mr. President, directly and personally he does not control a dollar. The money that is in the Treasury is in the custody of the law. It comes there according to law, and is to be paid out according to law. It is in the custody of the agents of the Government appointed according to our will. Does the Secretary hold the money? Does he have the key of a single safe? Does he control the expenditure of a dollar? Not one. He is more powerless to-day over the money in the Treasury than the Senator from Illinois. As a Senator, the Senator from Illinois can say, as far as his voice and vote shall go, what shall be done with the gold; the Secretary of the Treasury can but look to the law to see what shall be done with it. I confess my inability to solve the difficulty very satisfactorily.

The Senator has again spoken of a censure. I made no censure upon the Senator; intended none. That will not quite do, Mr. President: that will hardly answer the Senator's purpose. I say that directly in connection with the question whether it was safe to trust the Secretary of the Treasury with the discretionary control of $50,000, the Senator brought this matter before the Senate, and bringing it before the Senate for the purpose of argument and for the purpose of criticism, I have asked him where is the wrong with the Secretary. He has not yet answered it, and he cannot answer it.

I know he spoke about not being able to make me understand him. I heard that about twenty years ago in the justice of the peace court. I heard one lawyer say to the other, "I am not responsible if that gentleman cannot understand my argument." It is neither wit nor originality thus to answer me. I asked the Senator in what respect the Secretary of the Treasury was in fault in regard to this accumulation in the Treasury, and if he makes a criticism he holds himself responsible to the Senate to make his criticism complete. If the Secretary of the Treasury has refused to pay out money when a demand was made according to law, let us know the case. The Secretary tells us in this document, from which the Senator has read, that there is now due of the public debt not presented for payment $15,791,456 31. That is the showing; that there is a debt due and not paid of over fifteen million dollars. It is not presented, and can the Secretary of the Treasury pay it if it be not presented? Can he anticipate debts not due, and pay them according to his own pleasure and not according to law?

Mr. President, I do not say that in every respect I have agreed with the opinions expressed by the Secretary of the Treasury, but I know him to be a man of unquestionable integrity, of high ability, and entitled to the confidence of the Senate and of the country. Unless the Senator can show that the Secretary should have used this money in some way according to law no criticism based merely on the fact that the money has accumulated in the Treasury will hurt that distinguished gentleman's good name in the country.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Indiana alluded to his justice-of-the-peace experience, and I presume it was on that court that he learned to talk about something else than the case before the justice of the peace. He talks now about a criticism on the Secretary of the Treasury. Who has made any? I suppose that Senator had just as much confidence in Jake Thompson when he was Secretary of the Interior, and stole the money belonging to the Indians that was in the Interior Department. It was there according to law. Did he steal it according to law? The danger is in having power unnecessarily placed in the hands of persons. I suppose the Senator had just as much confidence at that time in Jake Thompson as he has now in his friend, the present Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I want to ask the Senator whether he makes the comparison between Secretary Thompson as Secretary of the Interior and Secretary McCulloch as Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, I have said what I have said, and I have already said (which the gentleman understands to be a justice-of-the-peace proceeding) that it is not my business to make him understand what I say.

Now, sir, I do not agree with the Senator that the Secretary of the Treasury has got no power over the money. I am not criticising the Secretary of the Treasury, but I am talking of the law. Does not the Senator know that the Secretary of the Treasury has authority under existing laws to sell more than $90,000,000 of gold to-morrow? Has he not got the power? I think it dangerous to trust such a power unnecessarily in the hands of any man.

That is not an attack upon the Secretary of the Treasury. It is the lodging of such vast powers anywhere that I regard as objectionable, and I say to the Senate that it is not safe, although you may have a law defining the duties of the officer with whom you intrust these unnecessary powers.

Why, sir, there would have been no devils in hell if they had not violated law. There would have been no rebellion and no treason if the men engaged in rebellion and treason had not violated law; and it is because we gave power into the hands of men which they abused, not because we do it particularly in this country, but because mankind the world over have placed power in the hands of others which they have abused, that the liberties of the people have been trodden down from the beginning of time.

Now, sir, there is no safety in having a law telling the person whom you clothe with extraordinary powers that he shall not abuse those powers. By and by you will find some one who is disposed to abuse them if he has the power to do it, and my point is that you should not unnecessarily confer power.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is an amendment to come in after line three hundred and ninety-one, on page 17:

For janitors for the Treasury Department, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate take a recess until seven o'clock.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let the next item be read.

Mr. WILSON. I withdraw the motion for that purpose.

The Secretary read the next item.

Mr. WILSON. I now move that the Senate take a recess until seven o'clock.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to say—

Mr. HENDRICKS. Does the chairman of the committee desire this?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desired and supposed I could get through with this bill to-day, and probably should but for this unexpected and long debate that has sprung up. We are getting to be so near the close of the session, and there is so much more business behind, that I should like to have this bill disposed of, and am therefore perfectly willing myself to have a recess and come here and finish it this evening.

Mr. CONNESS and others. Then let us finish it.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 16, noes 15; and the Senate accordingly took a recess until seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at seven o'clock p. m.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills and joint resolutions from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 1144) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the House of Representatives for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867—to the Committee on Finance.

A bill (H. R. No. 1146) for the relief of Mrs. Elizabeth Fletcher—to the Committee on Pensions.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 275) to extend the time for the use of certain vessels for quarantine purposes at the port of New York—to the Committee on Commerce.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. CRESWELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 577) to regulate the disposition of the proceeds of fines, penalties, and forfeitures incurred under the laws relating to the customs; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

WASHINGTON AND NEW YORK RAILROAD.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, the bill (H. R. No. 632) to authorize the building of a military and postal railroad from Washington, District of Columbia, to the city of New York, was taken from the table, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 896) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the bill will now be proceeded with, commencing where the reading was interrupted when the recess was taken.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was on page 19, after line four hundred and thirty-seven, to insert:

Bureau of Statistics:

For contingent expenses, namely: laborers, office furniture, carpets, fitting up files, and miscellaneous items, $4,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. On page 32, line seven hundred and eighty, I move to strike out "five" and to insert "nine;" and in lines seven hundred and eighty-one and seven hundred and eighty-two to strike out "$4,752, and to insert "$7,632;" so that the clause will read:

For compensation of nine watchmen and two laborers of the southwest executive building, $7,632.

It will be observed that this adds four watchmen to the number now authorized in the Navy Department building, and it is done at the request of the Secretary of the Navy, whose letter I have here, in which he states that owing to the very great enlargement of the building the five watchmen are entirely insufficient for the safety of the building. The committee were satisfied that it was so, and therefore agreed to report this amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 34, lines eight hundred and twenty-nine, eight hundred and thirty, and eight hundred and thirty-one, to strike out the following words:

That a sum not exceeding $10,000 be appropriated for the purchase of the Glover Museum: And provided further.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 35, after line eight hundred and thirty-four, to insert:

For the purchase of the Glover Museum, $10,000.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I see that that was just stricken out on the other page, and it is put in another place.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We have merely changed the place in which it is to come in.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to know what that is, and what it means.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is the museum that has been collected here for a considerable number of years past by Mr. Glover, which is very valuable and interesting, and the Committee on Finance thought it was well to purchase it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. What is it a museum of?

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is a collection of all sorts of agricultural specimens of different kinds, which has been prepared with great care and skill by Mr. Glover, who has devoted his life to it, and is an enthusiast in the matter, and it is very valuable.

Mr. RAMSEY. I trust this appropriation will be made. This collection contains some of the finest specimens in the world. There will be found in it every variety of apple, pear, and peach produced in the United States.

Mr. TRUMBULL. A museum used to be in the Patent Office, but that has been transferred over to the Smithsonian Institution.

Mr. FESSENDEN. These are agricultural specimens.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It seems to me we ought not to appropriate for two museums.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They are entirely different things. These are agricultural specimens, and the other is miscellaneous, of all sorts.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is true; but it seems to me there should be but one museum. If the Government is to have a museum it is a great undertaking. I believe some of the foreign Governments appropriate $60,000 a year to their museums.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Congress can order it transferred hereafter if they see fit.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It seems to me a strange idea to have a museum in the Agricultural Department and another one in the Smithsonian, that Congress appropriates, I suppose, to take care of, I do not know how much. It has to be attended by somebody. It used to be in the Patent Office, but we transferred it to the Smithsonian.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. Glover is connected with the Agricultural Department, one of the officers of it, and has been there for several years. He is an enthusiast in this matter.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It has no other connection with the Agricultural Department than that this person happens to be engaged there.

Mr. FESSENDEN. And the fact that it is of an agricultural character exclusively. This is a question as to the purchase of the museum; not where it shall be kept. It can be transferred hereafter if Congress think proper to do so.

Mr. RAMSEY. I really hope that this appropriation will be made. I think it is the most proper appropriation in the bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I know nothing about this museum, and I am not prepared to say that the appropriation should be made. It certainly does not strike me favorably. I have not examined this museum belonging to the Agricultural Department; but it is to me a little singular that we should be making such an appropriation.

Mr. CRESWELL. I will state that this very subject was under consideration in the Committee on Agriculture last year, and I believe the recommendation was unanimous that the Government should purchase this museum and preserve it in some appropriate building. It certainly forms the nucleus of a very valuable collection.

Mr. CATTELL. As I happen to be a member of the Committee on Agriculture I desire to say that this museum is peculiarly appropriate to the Agricultural Department. It contains specimens of the fruits suited to the different latitudes of our country and all the facts pertaining to them. There is also in it a collection of insectivorous birds, such birds as ought to be destroyed and such as ought to be preserved, all bearing on the subject of agriculture, and making this an exceedingly interesting museum. Mr. Glover has been offered for it from foreign Governments very much more money than we propose to give him here. He takes very great pride in it as having gotten it up here. I think it a very valuable museum, and I hope this appropriation will be made.

Mr. TRUMBULL. So far as birds are concerned, we have another collection of them at the Smithsonian.

Mr. FESSENDEN. These are specimens of the birds of foreign countries, brought here by the exploring expedition. These are the birds of this country.

Mr. CATTELL. These are specimens of our own birds, numbered and marked with their different characteristics, whether they are advantageous to agriculture as destructive of insects, or the contrary; whether they are such as ought to be destroyed or not, and a great many very interesting facts which are directly connected with our own country, and particularly applicable to the Agricultural Department.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator will wade through the thirteen quarto volumes of the Pacific railroad surveys he will find there a collection of all the birds and reptiles of this country, what they are good for, and for what purposes of evil they seem to exist, and he will find pictures of them; and then if he will go into the museum that we have got already established he will find the birds themselves, or their feathers and skins stuffed, and a very minute description. But I do not wish to say anything more in regard to this purchase. I shall not vote for it myself.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. On page 45, after line one thousand and ninety-one, I move to insert the following:

For the purchase of reports of the Supreme Court of the United States for the use of the Department of State, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill down to the following clause:

For necessary expenses in carrying into effect the several acts of Congress authorizing loans and the issue of Treasury notes, $2,000,000: Provided, That no further expenditures shall be made for the experimental system of hydrostatic printing by the Treasury Department until such experiments shall have been definitely authorized by law and a distinct appropriation made therefor.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That proviso escaped my notice. I think it ought not to remain in. I do not see the members of the committee here. That system of printing is no longer an experiment; it has been tried and is carried out, and that is the printing that is now going on. I am afraid that as the proviso is now worded it would interfere seriously with the business of the Department. I move to strike out the proviso. If there is anything wrong about it it can be set right on conference with the members of the House.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was on page 46, after line eleven hundred and two, to insert the following:

For facilitating communication between the Atlantic and Pacific States by electrical telegraph, $40,000.

Mr. POMEROY. I should like to have an explanation of precisely what is intended by "facilitating communication between the Atlantic and Pacific States by electrical telegraph."

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is under a contract to pay the company $40,000 a year. It was rejected at the last session, because there was some doubt whether they had not broken their contract. The committee examined it and came to the conclusion that on the whole it might as well be put in, whether they had broken their contract or not, of which we were not exactly satisfied, because we are obliged to have that amount, and more probably, of telegraphing. If we throw the contract aside we place ourselves perhaps more in the power of the company than the contract now places us. It would seem, therefore, not to be advisable to do that. This telegraphing must be paid for in some way. If we do not pay for it under the contract we shall have to pay what they see fit to charge for the telegraphing that is actually done. Therefore the committee came to the conclusion that it was best to insert this appropriation.

Mr. POMEROY. The language used, "facilitating communication between the Atlantic and Pacific States," does not look as if it was an appropriation to pay on a contract, but rather as if we were going to build a new line.

Mr. CONNESS. That is the old language.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is the language of all the appropriations on the subject.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONNESS. At this time I will ask the chairman of the Finance Committee if he has any especial information in regard to the provision on page 44, beginning at line one thousand and seventy-four, reading thus:

For legal assistance and other necessary special and extraordinary expenditures in the disposal of private land claims in California, $5,000.

I should like to ask the chairman if he has any information as to the necessity for the appropriation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is an appropriation which has been made several times before. They are obliged to employ extra counsel in those cases. I found it in the bill and also in the estimates that were made.

Mr. CONNESS. It will appear in the estimates and in the appropriation bills until the crack of doom unless it is stricken out.

Mr. POMEROY. When is that?

Mr. CONNESS. A very distant period I believe. [Laughter.] I move to strike out the clause I have read. My impression and my opinion is that it is simply an unnecessary appropriation of public money. The nature of the services consist in the prosecution in the Supreme Court of the United States of claims arising under the treaty with Mexico and grants made by the Mexican Government of lands in California. The public money has been used to the extent of hundreds of thousands of dollars in the prosecution of those claims with great injury to the State of California and with terrible severity upon honest claimants, while—

Mr. FESSENDEN. This appropriation is for contesting the claims, is it not?

Mr. CONNESS. Yes, sir; this is a continuation of it. Now those questions are nearly all at an end; they ought to have been ended long ago. Under these annual appropriations cases are kept in court the principles of which have been determined again and again for years past; and it is in vain that the parties ask a dismissal of cases that are pending here, and that are eventually decided as if dismissed by the court, as long as appropriations are made from the Treasury to employ legal assistance for the contesting of them. I move to strike out this clause.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know enough about it to make any comment on what the honorable Senator says. He is better acquainted with it than I am.

Mr. CONNESS. I have no doubt on the subject at all.

Mr. HOWARD. I shall vote to strike out this item. The reports of the Supreme Court are literally crammed with the decisions in litigations upon the California land titles which arose under the treaty with Mexico, and if it be possible to settle any leading principle of law with reference to those claims, or any series of principles, that settlement has already taken place, I should think, long ago; for you will find scores of decisions already made by the Supreme Court of the United States in the California land claims, one of which is but a precedent for another, involving the same principle from case to case and from year to year. I really think the Senator from California is correct when he says this appropriation is only an invitation to a continuance of the litigation respecting those claims.

Mr. CONNESS. That is it, when we want peace and quiet.

Mr. HOWARD. I think it is encouraging unnecessary lawsuits.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from California.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill, as follows:

For expenses in detecting and bringing to trial and punishment persons engaged in counterfeiting Treasury notes, bonds, and other securities of the United States, as well as the coins of the United States, $150,000.

Mr. HOWARD. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Finance as to the necessity of appropriating $150,000 to pay detectives for their services in detecting counterfeiters of the currency of the United States. Is not that sum rather large? It would pay a swarm of detectives in every part of the country and encourage their employment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is a very expensive and a very important service. I do not know of any more important item or money better spent than that.

Mr. HOWARD. Very likely. I see the necessity of having some such appropriation; but I wish to inquire of the Senator whether that is the appropriation that has been made heretofore.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I cannot tell just now, but I think the same appropriation was made last year. We made quite an appropriation for the current year, and it was struck down, and we afterward increased it on consultation.

Mr. HOWARD. Was the appropriation the same or nearly so?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I presume it was.

Mr. HOWARD. I merely inquired for information. It struck me as rather a large sum.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I did not make any inquiry about it. I found it in the bill as it came to us; but it is a pretty expensive business. Agents have to be employed and they have to be paid extra for peculiar services.

Mr. WILSON. And it is rather a useless business, too, for I find that almost all the men convicted are pardoned immediately. Still, I shall vote for the appropriation if the Senator wants it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is not a matter that depends on the appropriation at all.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the committee was on page 46, line eleven hundred and twenty-one, to strike out "four" and insert "five;" so as to read:

For compensation to the laborer in charge of the water-closets in the Capitol, $538.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In line eleven hundred and twenty-three, page 49, the word "the" should be inserted before "Capitol."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is a clerical correction which will be made.

Mr. FESSENDEN. On page 47, line eleven hundred and thirty-three, I move to strike out "$1,200" and to insert "$1,800;" so as to read:

For compensation of two day watchmen employed in the Capitol square, $1,800.

They are entitled to $900 each by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. On page 47, lines eleven hundred and thirty-five and eleven hundred and thirty-six, I move to strike out "$2,640" and to insert "$3,168;" so as to read:

To enable the Commissioner of Public Buildings to pay two policemen at the President's House, $3,168.

They are entitled by law to the same pay as the police of the Capitol.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was on page 47, after line eleven hundred and thirty-eight, to insert:

For compensation of two watchmen at the President's house, $1,440.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "$1,440" and inserting "$1,800." They get $900 apiece.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 47, after line eleven hundred and forty, to insert:

For compensation for three watchmen on the dome, $2,700.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 47, after line eleven hundred and forty-two, to insert:

For compensation to a person to take care of the heating apparatus of the Library of Congress, $1,000.

Mr. CRESWELL. May I ask the object of that clause? Under the present arrangement the heating apparatus of the Library is in the charge, I think, of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate and the Doorkeeper of the House, and if another person is appointed to take charge of the same engines—

Mr. FESSENDEN. This is not for the engines. This is the heating apparatus of the Library. The amendment is offered in accordance with the recommendation of the Commissioner of Public Buildings, who says that it is necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was on page 47, after line eleven hundred and forty-five to strike out the following clause:

For compensation of assistant doorkeeper at the President's House, $600.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That clause the committee struck out. I have since been informed, however, and I will state to the Senate, that although that is asked for as a new officer, there being only one doorkeeper authorized by law, we are all aware that the President's House has been refurnished, and very well furnished, and it is a very handsome sort of a place, and it is thought to be very necessary and economical to have some person there all the time to accompany visitors about the House. We know that formerly when it was fixed up it was very much injured; pieces were cut out of the furniture and a good deal of injury was done by visitors, and it is represented that it is advisable to have some person who shall be in constant attendance upon visitors there and accompany them to the different parts of the House where they go, and see that no damage is done. The appropriation is only $600, and I have come to the conclusion that it would be well to make the appropriation, and I think the committee would have come to the same conclusion had the same facts been stated to them. I leave it to the Senate therefore to decide. I doubt very much whether it is advisable to strike out that appropriation.

Mr. HOWARD. The bill has already given to the President two watchmen and some other servants.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Those two watchmen were there before, and the appropriation for their pay was accidentally left out by the House and is now put in. There are two watchmen there constantly, and must be necessarily, and two policemen and a doorkeeper. This is for an assistant doorkeeper inside the house to accompany visitors. My own opinion is that it is advisable to make the appropriation.

Mr. HOWARD. Very well; I make no objection. I will ask the chairman what "dome" is referred to in line eleven hundred and forty-one, "for compensation of three watchmen on the dome"—the dome of the Capitol?

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is but one dome, and that is the dome of the Capitol. I do not know of any other.

Mr. HOWARD. I thought it might perhaps apply to some other dome in the country. Perhaps you had better say "dome of the Capitol."

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no objection if the Senator has any doubt about it. I think the dome of the Capitol is "the dome."

Mr. HOWARD. Others might think differently.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question on the amendment proposed by the committee?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I could not hear from the chairman whether he recommended that this clause be stricken out.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The committee recommended that it should be struck out, not being informed of the facts and supposing we had provided last year all the officers that were necessary; but since that time I have been informed by the Commissioner of Public Buildings that it is very desirable to have this person in order to protect the property, to be there all the time to attend to visitors, which the doorkeeper cannot do. There must be one man at the door constantly. I think this appropriation advisable therefore, and have taken the liberty myself to suggest that I do not think it wise to conform to the recommendation of the committee in striking out the clause. That is all. The Senate of course will do as it pleases about it. We all know how much injury was done to the house, and it may be done again unless it is watched.

Mr. HOWARD. I think it is right.

Mr. CONNESS. It is useful; it shows that the committee are capable of making a mistake, that is all.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am painfully aware of that.

The amendment was rejected.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill to the following clause, lines eleven hundred and sixty-six to eleven hundred and seventy-two:

For additional compensation of $100 each to six watchmen, at $900, and of twenty per cent. of five laborers in the Capitol, one foreman and twenty-one laborers on public grounds, one gatekeeper, two day and two night watchmen, and two furnace-keepers, $4,762 80.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Finance whether the three watchmen employed in the square near the Smithsonian Institution are included in this paragraph? There was such a provision in the bill originally, but my impression is that, while it was pending in the House, that was struck out. I should like to inquire whether that has been restored, and whether those watchmen are included in those named in this paragraph.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This is only making provision for the additional pay provided by law to certain specified persons. It does not include them.

Mr. CONNESS. I propose, then, in a moment, to offer an amendment to provide for them; and I will state that there are, I think, three watchmen employed in this square to which I have referred. They have been employed there for a year, and have performed some very valuable service there. It is a place where bad characters in the city had been in the habit of frequenting, and there was no part of the city that required watchmen more than it did. The Commissioner of Public Buildings appointed three soldiers, some of whom were maimed and one I believe honorably discharged; but the House, in a spasm of economy, struck out the appropriation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator will find a provision for those watchmen at the top of page 48, lines eleven hundred and fifty-one and eleven hundred and fifty-two:

For the compensation of five watchmen in reservation No. 2, $4,500.

Reservation No. 2 is the ground on which is the Smithsonian Institution.

Mr. CONNESS. Then it is all right.

The next item of the bill was read, providing for the Metropolitan police, as follows:

Metropolitan police:

For salaries and other necessary expenses of the Metropolitan police for the District of Columbia, $208,850. And the compensation of said Metropolitan police force, officers, and clerks, be, and the same is hereby, increased twenty per cent. upon the amount hereby appropriated, commencing on the 1st day of November, 1868, said increase to be borne by the cities of Washington and Georgetown, and the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, in the proportion equal to the number of patrolmen allotted severally to the city of Washington, to the city of Georgetown, and the county of Washington; and the levy court of said county be, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered to levy a special tax not exceeding one quarter of one per cent. for the purpose aforesaid: Provided, That hereafter no person shall be appointed as policeman or watchman who has not served in the Army or Navy of the United States, and received an honorable discharge.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In line eleven hundred and seventy-nine I move to strike out "twenty per cent." and insert "fifty per cent." The House of Representatives were evidently laboring under a misapprehension about this matter. They supposed the provision which was inserted in the estimates in regard to this matter was for giving an additional twenty per cent. The fact is that we gave last year an additional fifty per cent., and instead of its being terminated now they have it by law up to the 1st day of next July, and this should be an appropriation to continue it. It is not an appropriation out of the Treasury, but it is requiring the corporations of Washington city and Georgetown and Washington county to appropriate the fifty per cent. increase, and assess a tax to meet it, which was agreed to last year all round. Evidently the House misapprehended the effect and intention of this provision from its not being aware of what was done last year. I move to amend the clause by striking out in line eleven hundred and seventy-nine "twenty" and inserting "fifty;" by striking out in line eleven hundred and eighty "November" and inserting "July;" by striking out "six" in line eleven hundred and eighty-one and inserting "seven;" so as to read "fifty per cent. upon the amount hereby appropriated, commencing on the 1st day of July, 1867;" and then, after "county of Washington," in line eleven hundred and eighty-three, I move to insert "beyond the limits of said cities;" and in line eleven hundred and eighty-seven to strike out "empowered" and insert "required."

The amendments were agreed to.

The Secretary read the second section of the bill, as follows:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That to enable the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay the increased compensation voted by the House during the Thirty-Ninth Congress to its employees, clerks, and others, and to pay the increased rate of compensation thereby authorized, a sum sufficient therefor is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The Committee on Finance reported an amendment to strike out the section.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next section was read as follows:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the proviso contained in the third section of chapter two hundred and ten of the act of July 2, 1864, shall be construed to embrace all suits to which the United States shall be a party in the Court of Claims, either plaintiff or defendant.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That section repeals a clause in an appropriation act of 1864, a proviso which reads in these words:

"That in the courts of the United States there shall be no exclusion of any witness on account of color, nor in civil actions because he is a party to or interested in the issue tried."

At a subsequent period Congress amended this proviso which I have just read by declaring—

"That in any action by or against executors, administrators, or guardians, in which judgment may be rendered for or against them, neither party shall be allowed to testify against the other as to any transaction with, or any statement of, the testator, intestate, or ward, unless called to testify thereto by the opposite party, or required to testify thereto by the court."

The reason of this amendment was that it was supposed there was no mutuality where a party was permitted to testify in a suit by an administrator or guardian; the guardian or administrator would not know about the transaction and hence it was improper, although the law was extended so as to allow parties to testify in court in cases in which they were interested as a general rule, to extend that to cases where one of the parties acted in a fiduciary capacity. Now it is very questionable, I think, whether this law should be extended to the Court of Claims, so as to allow parties to testify. The United States has no one to testify for it, and the claimant who presents his claim swears to his petition now. The effect of this section of this bill is to allow the claimant to come in there as a witness as against the United States.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think the section ought to be struck out.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is no mutuality in it. I do not think the provision ought to be extended to the Court of Claims. I understand that this section got into the appropriation bill under an impression that the Court of Claims excluded a person of color from testifying. That is not so. I have been furnished with a decision of the court on that subject, and I will read a sentence or two from it:

"It has been suggested that if parties cannot testify, persons of color cannot, as both are rendered eligible by the same act. There was never a law of Congress which excluded witnesses on account of color, and this court has always recognized the rules of the common law which make no such distinction."

So that in that court they admit persons of color to testify, and the only effect of retaining this third section in this bill is to allow a party to be a witness in the Court of Claims in a case where there is no mutuality.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will the Senator move to strike out the section?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think it had better be stricken out.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I make no objection. Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that it be stricken out.

Mr. POLAND. I hardly have the heart to say anything in favor of this provision if the chairman of the Finance Committee consents to have it stricken out; but it seems to me there is very little reason for striking it out. It is very proper, as I think, where one party to a transaction is dead, and a suit is prosecuted by the administrator who, of course, has no personal knowledge in relation to the matter, that the other party should not be allowed to testify because the party who really know about it on the other side is dead and cannot appear to testify. The case of the Government is likened to that. It seems to me there is no analogy between the two. All contracts and dealings of the Government are done by some agent or officer of the Government.

Mr. TRUMBULL. And he is a witness for both parties.

Mr. POLAND. Not always. I think that wherever an officer or an agent has made a contract on the part of the Government, and there comes up a litigation about it, and that officer or agent is a witness for the Government, he is not any more to be trusted as a witness than a man who comes into court and testifies for himself. The United States never was a witness, never was alive so that it could testify against the opposite party, but the person with whom the dealing was made, the officer or agent who transacted the business or made the contract on the part of the Government is alive, so that the Government has his testimony, the testimony of one party who really made the contract, and it seems to me entirely just and fair that the party on the other side should be a witness if we want to keep up this mutual right under the system of allowing parties to testify in their own cases. It seems to me it ought to be extended to cases where the Government is a party.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I proposed the provision of law which has been referred to, allowing parties to be witnesses in their own behalf. Certainly I never intended to apply that provision of law to cases in which the United States was a party to claims against the Government, which are subject, of course, to such peculiar rules as the Government may prescribe.

At a subsequent session, after the adoption of that provision on my motion, suits in which the representatives of estates were parties were excluded from the operation of that law, and with my concurrence.

Now, sir, the same reason which applies in the case of estates will apply to a case of claims against the Government of the United States.

There is no mutuality of privilege either in the case of estates or in the case of the Government: there is no party which may confront the plaintiff by representing the opposite side of the case. I think, therefore, that the proposed provision of this bill is imprudent, that that innovation upon the law which was established upon my motion at a former session ought to be confined to cases between private parties, where both are competent to testify and both enjoy the privilege provided by the law. For that reason I shall be in favor of striking out this section in the bill from the House.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not agree with the Senator from Pennsylvania upon this question. I do not think there is an analogy between the two cases. Two men make a contract; one of them dies; it is not right that the survivor of them should testify against the estate of the other, because there is no balancing testimony, if I may so express it. But a man who brings a suit against the Government of the United States in the Court of Claims, or who is sued by the Government in any of the United States courts, sues or is sued upon some contract or arrangement between him and some agent or officer of the Government, and this officer or agent is always a competent witness, and I have observed that the testimony given on behalf of the Government in such cases has an undue weight. I have seen what I think to be wrong, because of the official weight that is thrown into a case when the testimony is given by an officer in addition to the weight that the testimony would have coming merely from an ordinary witness.

Before the vote is taken on striking out the section, I move to insert after the word "all" in the fourth line the word "civil," and to strike out in the fifth line the words "in the Court of Claims;" so as to make the section read:

That the proviso contained in the third section of chapter two hundred and ten of the act of July 2, 1864, shall be construed to embrace all civil suits to which the United States shall be a party, either plaintiff or defendant.

I am not sure that this will change the rule that obtains in the courts now. I rather think that under the law as it stands the United States courts allow parties to suits to testify, but that there may be no question about it, I move this amendment.

Mr. BUCKALEW. If I recollect aright, the original provision to which reference is made applied only to civil suits. Criminal proceedings were excluded from that law.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am a little afraid that by the use of this general language, without inserting the word "civil," the section might be construed to include criminal cases. If you say by this section that the law of 1864 shall be construed to embrace all suits to which the United States are a party, that will be extending the operation of the rule, and may be construed to include criminal cases, which it ought not to do.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I trust the amendment will not be adopted. It is only enlarging the thing still further.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question occurs on the motion of the Senator from Illinois to strike out the section.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think it ought to be struck out. I think it would be very dangerous to admit parties to testify where there is nobody in fact interested on the other side. It is contrary to the theory on which the testimony of parties is admitted. There is no knowing where the Government agents, whoever they may be, may be when the testimony is wanted. They may be scattered in various parts of the country; it may be difficult to find them, while the party is always to be found if he is living and becomes a party to a suit against the United States.

The motion to strike out was agreed to.

The Secretary read the last amendment reported by the Committee on Finance, which was to insert as a new section:

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That each night watchman at the Treasury Department shall, from the 1st day of July, 1867, receive a compensation of $900 per annum; and an amount sufficient to pay said increased compensation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, is hereby appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance to offer the following amendment as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to appoint in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions, in addition to the clerks now authorized in said office, twenty-eight clerks of class one, twenty-four clerks of class two, sixteen of class three, and ten of class four; said clerks to expire at the end of two years; and a sum sufficient to pay the salaries of said clerks from the date of their appointment to the 30th of June, 1867, and for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

If any explanation is needed, I will say that this amendment provides for nearly eighty more clerks in the Pension Office; and I have a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a letter from the Commissioner of Pensions, in which that officer states that it will be impossible for him to get along, so great is the increase of business there, unless he has these additional clerks. The committee were satisfied of the truth of the statement. I will have the letters read if any Senator desires to hear them. ["No!" "No!"]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. On page 45, line one thousand and ninety-one, after the word "dollars," I move to insert:

And in case said court shall in any year direct said reporter to publish a second volume of its decisions, $1,500 in addition thereto, to be paid on the delivery by said reporter to the Secretary of the Interior for distribution, according to existing laws, of three hundred copies of such second volume."

The appropriation of $2,500 as a salary for the reporter of the Supreme Court contemplates the publication of one volume of the reports of decisions, and the delivery of three hundred copies to the Secretary of the Interior for distribution. It has sometimes happened in former years that the court has directed two volumes to be published, and in such cases an additional appropriation has always been made. This year it is in contemplation to publish two volumes. The reporter addressed the Secretary of the Interior upon the subject, and that officer sent us a communication, recommending an appropriation of $2,500; but the Committee on the Judiciary, which considered this subject, thought $1,500 would be sufficient. The $2,500 is paid to the reporter for three hundred copies of its reports. That is more than the three hundred copies are worth in the market, but it is intended as a sort of salary to the reporter, and to make up to him a sufficient compensation for getting out the reports, there being no very large sales of the reports, and there being a necessity that they should be published; but the committee thought if a second volume was to be published in any year, $1,500 should be enough for three hundred copies of that volume, which is about the market price, five dollars a volume, and they report this amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEWART. In line one thousand and eighty-two I move to strike out "tenth" and insert "ninth," so as to read: "for traveling expenses of the judge assigned to the ninth circuit;" &c., and then to add to the clause:

And where an allowance has been made or shall hereafter be made for traveling or other expenses of any justice allotted to a circuit embracing particular districts, such allowance shall not be affected by any change in the number of the circuits, but shall be made to the justice within whose circuit such districts are included.

Mr. TRUMBULL. When we make the appropriation we can always designate the proper circuit.

Mr. STEWART. It might as well be provided for in this general language. There is a difficulty about the appropriation of last year because of the number of the circuit having been changed. This is to cover that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to have the question put separately. The first part of the amendment I have no objection to; the second I object to.

Mr. STEWART. Very well, I withdraw the last part, and move simply to strike out "tenth" and insert "ninth."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to propose the following amendment, to come in after line one thousand and eighty-five, on page 45:

And be it further enacted, That the salaries of the district judge of the district of California shall be $5,000; and the salaries of the district judges of the districts of Massachusetts, southern and eastern districts of New York, eastern district of Pennsylvania, Maryland, northern district of Illinois, Louisiana, Oregon, and Nevada shall be $4,500 each; and the salary of every other district shall be $4,000; and such salaries shall be in full compensation for all official services performed by such judges, and no other allowance or payment shall be made to them for traveling expenses or otherwise.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator had better propose that as an additional section at the end of the bill. He cannot interpose an enacting clause in that way in the middle of a section.

Mr. POLAND. I have no objection to having it come in as an additional section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY.) The amendment will be put in that form.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no doubt that there ought to be an increase of the salaries of some of the judges; but I think from hearing the amendment read that it puts some of them too high, more than I should be willing to agree to. I should like to know on what principle the amendment is predicated? It doubles the salaries of the district judges in New England, or most of them. It doubles the salaries of the district judges in Vermont, Maine, New Hampshire, and Rhode Island, who now receive but $2,000 each.

Mr. TRUMBULL. But it cuts off what they now receive for going into other districts.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They do not get much in that way.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The district judge of Vermont goes very often to New York to hold court there.

Mr. POLAND. This subject was brought before the Judiciary Committee at the last session, and very considerable examination was made with a view to get at the proper sums which should be fixed as the salaries of the district judges, and to equalize as well as we could the salaries among them. They were quite unequal as we found them, and generally insufficient. The very highest salary named in this amendment is for the judge in the California district. That is not raised by this amendment. It was fixed at $5,000 when that district was established, and it has so remained since.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I thought that had been increased to $6,000.

Mr. POLAND. No; it stands at $5,000 now.

Mr. CONNESS. It has not been increased.

Mr. POLAND. We selected some seven or eight of the important districts, the heavier districts, and put them in the $4,500 class. This class includes the district of Massachusetts, which embraces the whole of the State, with the large commercial city of Boston; the New York city districts, the eastern district of Pennsylvania, which includes the city of Philadelphia; the Maryland district, which includes the city of Baltimore; and the district of Louisiana, including New Orleans; and we leave in this class the districts of Nevada and Oregon, where the judges now get $4,500. In New England, as the Senator from Maine has said, the salary of each of the district judges is $2,000, except in the Massachusetts district, where it is $3,000. The salaries were fixed at this sum many years ago, at a time when $2,000 was really a better salary, furnished more of the means of living, than the salary of $4,000 that we now propose. The Senator from Maine knows very well, as every body knows, that the expenses of living since the day when those salaries were fixed at $2,000 have more than doubled and especially where a man's duties, like those of a judge, call him from home, where he is subjected to traveling and hotel expenses, the necessary expenditures have very much more than doubled in that period of time.

More than this, the business in the district courts has very largely increased everywhere. Since the adoption of the system of internal taxation all cases which arise under it go into the district courts. The very large increase in the duties on imports has caused a great many cases to arise under our laws in relation to importations. All that class of cases go into the district courts. Then there are a great many cases growing out of the operations of the late war, all of which go into the district courts. The business of those courts has very largely increased. I know in reference to my own State that the business of the district judge is more than ten times as much as it was ten years ago.

There is a very considerable difference in the size of the districts and in the amount of business in the districts; but a law which has been in force for a considerable number of years provides that the judge of one district may be called upon to go into another district where the business is too heavy for the single judge of the district, and hold there a district court and a circuit court; and it is well known to members of the legal profession, at least in my section of the country, that until the establishment of the eastern or Long Island district, in New York, and the creation of a new judge there, which was really intended to help the business in New York city, a large portion of the business of the district and circuit courts in New York city was done by the district judge of Vermont and the district judge of Connecticut. It was also provided in connection with that law that these judges should be paid their expenses for attending court there in that way. I believe that by this amendment we shall not add very much to the pay that the Vermont and Connecticut judges receive, with their present salaries and their expenses while holding court in New York which are allowed under the present law. We intended to fix the salaries at a sum that shall be sufficient without having any provision made for the payment of expenses, and we have therefore added a clause that no other compensation shall be made to them except that made as a salary.

Without taking any more time on the subject I will simply say that I believe we have approached as near a just equalization of these salaries among the judges as can be made, and that the sums we have fixed are not more than the judges ought to receive.

Mr. SHERMAN. If this amendment is to be adopted, I desire to amend it by inserting "the southern district of Ohio" after "the northern district of Illinois." The judgeship of that district is, I am told, the most laborious office of the West. The court is held at Cincinnati, the largest city in the West, and having the largest commercial transactions. If the increase is to be made, I desire that the $4,500 class shall include the southern district of Ohio, and I move so to amend the amendment.

Mr. POLAND. I apprehend that if we vary from the sums that the committee has fixed upon as proper there will be no end to it. My friend from New Jersey has been laboring with the committee with great earnestness and with great sincerity, I have no doubt, to have this highest class of salary reach the district judge in New Jersey. He says it is no more than right and just that he should have it, that he is a very industrious man, and works the entire year through. Precisely the same thing has been said to me by at least half a dozen gentlemen in the Senate in reference to the district judges in their own States. I think that there is very great danger if we undertake to depart from what the committee have settled upon after a good deal of deliberation and examination. If we vary this we shall have a very considerable job before us, and I think the salaries as we have proposed them are certainly low enough in all cases, perhaps too low in some; but if any of them are to be raised from what we propose very many more of them must be raised in order to make an equality.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not make this motion upon any arbitrary reasons, but simply because that I know the United States judge at Cincinnati is constantly employed. Cincinnati being the largest city of the western States, the amount of business that is thrown into that court is very great. Judge Leavitt, who is now a man somewhat aged, is occupied all his time, so that he has no leisure or recreation. If the judge of the northern district of Illinois should have $4,500, certainly the judge of the southern district of Ohio should have it. The amount of commercial business at Cincinnati, the amount of our internal commerce on the rivers, and the amount of internal revenue collected there are very great. The population of the district is very large. The revenue collected from whisky at Cincinnati alone is probably as much as in all the rest of the State of Ohio. The case of the judge at Cincinnati is as strong as any other that can be presented. I do not make the motion in regard to the northern district, because it is not so populous and the business is not so great.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The amount of business in the district courts does not entirely depend upon population. The committee, as has been remarked by the Senator from Vermont, had a good deal of consultation and a good deal of difficulty in arranging these salaries as to how many classes we should make. There has been a pressure from all parts of the United States for an increase of the salaries of the district judges for several years. There have been referred to the Judiciary Committee for the last four or five years numerous petitions from nearly every district in the Union. The committee have resisted this, and this is the first time we have reported from that committee an increase of salary. There have been one or two salaries raised in the Senate, without the report of the committee, on the motion of Senators, and the House of Representatives, at this session, has passed a bill increasing the salary of the judge in one of the districts; it has not yet passed this body. But the pressure was so great, and the reasonableness of it was so manifest, that the committee thought the time had now come when we should increase the salaries of these judges. I think every body sees that it ought to be done. A judge of the United States court can do no other business.

Then the question arose, how many classes of them shall we make? Manifestly those who were occupied all the time, and had very responsible and heavy duties to perform ought to be paid something more than those in smaller districts, where the expenses of living perhaps were less, and there was less to do. We made two classes, or rather three classes, because the salary of the judge in California was fixed at $5,000 some years ago, and under the Constitution it cannot be reduced, but he is the only one at that. Then there are several whose salaries are now $4,500.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What are those?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The judges on the Pacific, in Nevada and Oregon. There are several whose salaries are now $3,750, and some $3,500. We selected a few and placed them at $4,500, and they are in those districts in which the committee knew the judges were occupied the whole time. The southern district of Ohio is not one that we have put in this class. The Senator from Ohio tells us that Cincinnati is the largest city in the West. Well, its population is hardly so large as St. Louis. Cincinnati is not quite as large as St. Louis, according to the official returns of the last census.

Mr. SHERMAN. Larger.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think the returns show St. Louis to be a little larger; but we have not embraced the judge at St. Louis in this class. The judge at Chicago is embraced.

The population of Chicago is now upward of two hundred thousand, and at Chicago, as every body knows, there is a great deal of admiralty business. The shipping is very large and the judge is occupied constantly. There is doubtless a good deal of business at Cincinnati. We had before us the returns from a number of these districts showing the number of cases and we made this classification on the evidence that was before us.

If you embrace the Cincinnati district the Senators from Missouri will ask that the judge presiding at St. Louis shall have $4,500; and my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. Howe] is about to move that the judge who presides at Milwaukee, a large city on the lake, shall have $4,500; and my friend from Michigan [Mr. Howard] will insist upon it for the judge in his district.

Mr. HOWE. What is the authority for the Senator's statement in regard to me.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I understood my friend in his quiet way to say that if this was adopted he should go for it in another district.

Mr. HOWE. I certainly did.

Mr. TRUMBULL. At any rate the Senator from Michigan, as I understand him, said that if the judge of the southern district of Ohio was put in the $4,500 class he would move to insert in it the judge for the eastern district of Michigan.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand there is not as much business in the two districts of Michigan as in the northern district of Ohio, the court for which is held at Cleveland, but I do not propose to raise the salary of that judge. The amount of business in the district court for the southern district of Ohio, as the returns show, is, I think, fully as large as in any district west of the mountains.

Mr. HOWARD. Allow me a word?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Certainly.

Mr. HOWARD. I think upon a comparison of the statistics of the amount of business done in the court to which the Senator from Ohio refers, the southern district of Ohio, with that done in the eastern district of Michigan, it will turn out that the business in the latter district is larger. I have very little fear of the result of such a comparison.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not design to take up the time of the Senate in regard to this question, or to argue it. I only wish to say to the Senate about what the Senator from Vermont has said, that if you depart from the recommendation of the committee you will have the matter up here upon almost every district.

Mr. WILSON. We had better vote it all down.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think not. I think the Senator from Massachusetts is mistaken in what public duty and good policy require. If he thinks we should keep the salaries at the sums that are now paid, be it so. He may say that they may resign; but when men have been judges for some years, are out of other business, and are good judges, it is difficult for them to get into practice again. We must have judges of these courts. I think the public service would suffer by the resignation of these judges. I do not believe we should act upon any impulse growing out of a feeling toward the Supreme Court on account of any decision that has been made. This law will apply to all the judges of all the districts and of all politics. I think it is eminently just that the salaries should be raised. I should be glad to vote to raise the salary of the judge in the southern district of Ohio and put it at $4,500. I think he ought to have it from the little knowledge I have of the amount of business there. Still I will not vote for it now, because we have arranged this amendment upon an examination of all these salaries, and the committee unanimously I think agreed to report the amendment as the Senator from Vermont has proposed it as the best thing, considering the whole matter, we could agree upon. I trust the Senate will adopt it.

Mr. HOWARD. I have no disposition to take up the time of the Senate in discussing this amendment. I shall vote for it with a great deal of pleasure. I have no doubt that the Committee on the Judiciary have considered this subject very fairly and have come to a very correct result: that they have allowed a small increase of the salaries of the district judges—a necessity which has existed in their cases for several years to my own personal knowledge. I give, as a single instance, the condition of the judge of the eastern district of Michigan, where I reside, and in whose court I have been in the habit of practicing. It is undoubtedly no exception to the general state of things that exists among the judges. It is undoubtedly true that the compensation of that class of Federal judges has been and still is quite too small. It has been in many cases $2,500 a year, in some cases $2,000 a year; in a few cases it has been raised from $2,500 to $3,000; but it is impossible, as we all know, for a gentleman who has no other business from which to support his family to subsist respectably upon this small salary, and some of the judges have been almost in a state of starvation. I have been told by certainly two of them that they find it next to impossible to make their ends meet at the close of the year out of their salaries. I hope, therefore, that the Senate will adopt the amendment suggested by the Committee on the Judiciary. I think it is reasonable and by no means too high. I trust that we shall not interfere with it in any way, but adopt it as they have reported it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. This salary was fixed doubtless when the office was a mere sinecure, when little was done in it. Since the revenue business has grown up the district court has charge of all that business. I know that in New Jersey there is more business done now in one term, and the records will show it, than used to be done in twenty years. The salary then was $2,000: it is proposed now to make it $4,000. I know that there are a hundred indictments tried a year in that court. While New Jersey is but the fourteenth State in the Union in population, it is the sixth in point of revenue, which brings an immense amount of business before this court. Judge Field, once a member of this Senate, an able lawyer, gives his time exclusively to the discharge of the duties of that office, and the Government of the United States pays him $2,000, while the State of New Jersey, which is frugal at least in its expenditures, pays her circuit judges $4,800, more than as much again. My opinion of it is that the Government cannot afford not to raise the salaries of these judges: it is economy to raise them. If not, the offices will be filled by persons not competent to discharge the duties. They now protect the revenue and enforce the laws of Government. The Government owes it to itself to raise these salaries.

Mr. DIXON. The judges of the district courts whose salaries are proposed to be raised by this amendment are by their occupation excluded from every species of employment except that of a judge. A statute of the United States prohibits their practicing law in the State courts; they cannot even act as counsel. I believe they cannot even draw a paper, a conveyance; I think that is forbidden, but I am not quite sure. At any rate they are prohibited from advising or acting as counsel; they have no occupation therefore to which they can resort as a general rule. They are acknowledged to be highly competent men. They cannot, as is acknowledged everywhere, live upon the salaries which they now receive. Is it desirable, is it for the public interest, that men in that position should be compelled to perform the duties they perform on inadequate salaries which are not sufficient to support them? I care nothing for the clamor about raising salaries. I am willing to vote for what is right. Why, sir, what has Congress done? We have raised our own pay. Five thousand dollars a year is not thought to be too much for Senators and Representatives. I do not say it is; but certainly if it is not too much, what is proposed to be given is not too much for a man who devotes all the energies of his mind and his whole time, so far as needed, as far as the business requires, to the duties of a judge. I think the amendment ought to be adopted. I wish it were in order for me to add to the list of those who are to receive $4,500 the judge of the district of Connecticut, whose time is wholly occupied, an extremely able lawyer, not inferior to any man in the State. I should be glad to move to raise his salary to $4,500, but it is not in order to do so, and I will rest contented with $4,000, which it is proposed to give him. I shall vote for it most cheerfully.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope we shall get to a vote on this proposition at some time. I know when lawyers get clients they squeeze them, and I am afraid the Treasury will come out squeezed, and I am anxious to get through with it. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOWE. I was obliged to correct the statement of the Senator from Illinois to the effect that I had given notice of a purpose to move to raise the salary of the district judge in Wisconsin—to correct it because he misunderstood me. The remark I made was made aside to the Senator from Michigan and had reference to a different district; but while I did not give notice of any such purpose, I must not be understood as intimating that I do not appreciate the services of the district judge for the district of Wisconsin. There is but one district in that State, and the State has one very large commercial port, the city of Milwaukee. He is obliged to hold court not only there but at the capital of the State, involving the necessity of some considerable travel.

I should not feel called upon, however, to move to increase his salary beyond that proposed by the committee even if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio were adopted. I am inclined to think the judge of that court would think the salary recommended by the committee satisfactory. It is as high and really higher than we pay the judges of the State. Nevertheless there is a very large amount of business transacted in that court, and the judge I am bound to say devotes himself to the business of the court most assiduously, industriously, and is a very able lawyer. I do not know that the business of the southern district of Ohio is not greater than that of the whole State of Wisconsin; it would surprise me, however, to be informed that it was as great as that embraced in the district of Wisconsin. There have been before the Senate the records establishing what is the relative amount of business done in the different districts, and my recollection is that the southern district of Ohio did not rank as high as the district of Wisconsin, but I will not undertake to speak positively on that point.

Mr. SHERMAN. I had a memorandum which was furnished me by the district attorney of the number of cases, and my impression is that the number of cases on the docket was over six hundred; but I would not speak positively. I know the judge is constantly employed.

Mr. HOWE. I have only a very general recollection as to what was the relative amount of business.

Mr. SHERMAN. And I will state to my friend that the district contains over a million and a half of people, which although not a precise indication is one indication of the amount of business. It includes all the State of Ohio south of a certain line.

Mr. HOWE. It is a very uncertain indication, as the Senator will admit, of the amount of business done in the court. The commerce down the Ohio river I suppose is not as great as that on the lakes by any manner of means, but that furnishes a large amount of the business. Probably the business connected with the collection of the internal revenue in the southern district of Ohio would equal that of the district of Wisconsin. If it should be conceded by the Senate that $4,500 is not too much for the judge of the southern district of Ohio, and if the proof shall show that the business transacted in that court is not greater than that in the district of Wisconsin, of course, as a matter of justice, I shall be compelled to ask that the salary there be equalized.

Mr. WADE. I do not exactly understand why these salaries should be graduated upon the principle of the amount of business a judge has to do. The judges are placed in their positions to do all the business that is to be done, and the smallest district I presume will take all the time the judge has. He can engage in no other business. I suppose that if a judge is what he ought to be, industrious, he will not think it any hardship that he has to decide a greater or less number of cases. He is a Government agent to perform all the business that comes before him. If you are to graduate the salaries of judges upon the number of cases they decide, why not bring in their dockets and see how much each of them has to do? I do not think it is a reasonable principle. A man's entire time must be occupied when he takes upon himself the office of a judge. Everybody knows that he can do nothing else. He will want as much to eat and drink and wear if he has but few cases before him as though he had ever so many. I think that is not a criterion for us to be guided by, and hence we should not be inquiring and endeavoring to find out whether one judge has a case or two more or less than another in order to ascertain whether you will increase his salary or not. If in general the judges' salaries are not enough, increase them and make them right; but let us not spend much time in ascertaining which judge has the most or which the least business to do. We do not graduate our own salaries on that consideration. Some of us do a great deal more business than others, and some a great deal less than others, but the latter class would hardly consent to take any less for their services.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I was not at the meeting of the committee at the time this was decided upon, or I think I should have insisted upon the southern district of Ohio being included within the $4,500 class. I know something about the business of that court, and I think that if it is proper to increase the salary at Chicago and some other points to $4,500 the judge of the southern district of Ohio ought to be included within the list. Cincinnati is a city of very large commerce. A great deal of business is done upon the rivers coming from Kentucky, Indiana, and Ohio, and the class of business that is likely to go into the United States courts is very large at that point.

I do not agree with the Senator from Ohio who has just addressed the Senate, [Mr. WADE,] that there is no difference between the case of a man who holds court for ten days every six months and one who is constantly occupied in the investigation of very weighty causes the whole year round. I think the service done to the public in the two cases is very different. To be sure both have to live; but men are compensated according to the responsibility of their position. We pay some of the heads of bureaus in this city $6,000—I believe the Treasurer gets that much—some others $5,500, while others get but $3,500. The reason is because of the enormous labor and responsibility thrown upon some as compared with others.

Judge Leavitt at Cincinnati is called upon to try very important causes indeed. I was at Cincinnati upon legal business just before I came to the Senate, and he then was engaged in a cause which had occupied four weeks; the very ablest counsel of the city were employed in it. That is but one of a great many causes, and it was most complicated, requiring great care and labor. I know that he has many causes of that sort. It is not like the districts that are altogether agricultural. In agricultural districts there is very little business naturally going into the United States courts. Business goes into those courts at points where there are commercial relations with other States and where the contracts are between men of different States. There is a great deal of that sort of business at Cincinnati. I do not know that it is equal to that at Chicago entirely, but I should think very nearly so, because Chicago has a business reaching into Iowa and Wisconsin, while the commerce of Cincinnati extends into Indiana, Kentucky, and Tennessee, in addition to her business connection with the eastern States and cities. It is certainly right, if we increase any of these salaries to $4,500, then the judge at Cincinnati should be included, and if I had been at the meeting of the committee when this question was decided I think I should have insisted on putting him in that class.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have long been of opinion that the salaries of the district judges ought to be increased. I have been of that opinion from my own observation in New England and from what I have heard from others. When I was a student at law in the city of Portland, where I reside, the judge of the United States for the district of Maine received a salary of $1,000 a year. That was the salary then fixed by law. He went on so for several years. After some years his salary was increased to $1,800. He was a gentleman of a great deal of learning and a great deal of humor. I remember that the year when his salary was thus increased somebody was saying that Congress had done nothing that was worthy of note, and he remarked that it was the best Congress he had known anything about for a great many years, because they had passed one admirable law, and that was the one increasing his salary. Afterward, when I was a member of Congress, I found that the salaries of judges in different places were being increased, and I moved an addition of $200 to the salary of the judge of the district of Maine and it was placed at $2,000, and that I believe was then done throughout New England. He was a man of admirable habits, of the highest character, and the highest learning. His admiralty decisions are a text-book throughout the Union and are well known in Europe. Judge Story said of him that he was the best admiralty lawyer in the world. He held the office until last year, when he resigned it. He had been talking of resigning for several years. I remarked that he was a man of simple habits, an economical man; and he had not a large family—only two or three children. But he held the office for several years after he wished to resign; he was eighty-two and quite deaf, though he retained his intellect remarkably well, and he told me that he felt it to be his duty to the country to resign, and the only reason why he did not was that he did not know how he should live after he did resign, for he had not been able to save enough income to pay the expenses of his family. A sense of duty to the public in his advanced age at last compelled him to resign.

I thought of taking the office myself when he resigned, but nobody seemed to recommend me for it; nobody in the State seemed to think I was the man for that place. I thought that, with what I had, I could get on with $2,000 salary; but as nobody spoke of me or thought of appointing me to the place I said nothing about it, and a gentleman was appointed whose income from his profession was certainly not less than $10,000 a year, who had the highest rank in the profession, but who thought he would like to retire from the care of a large practice. He has held the office something less than a year, and he sent me word the other day by a friend who was writing to me that if I was ready to take his office I was welcome to it at any time, for he could not live on it, and anybody might have it from him.

It is true the salaries ought to be raised. I thought, however, when this amendment was read that the salaries proposed were put too high. I should not have struck so high a figure as the Judiciary Committee have; but I would not undertake to interpose my opinion in many cases against theirs. It may be, as has been intimated, that instead of being too high they are not high enough in some cases. It does strike me that a man who is fit to be a judge of the district court of the United States and to do all the business that is done in that court, who must devote all his time to it, who cannot do anything else, is not overpaid, as things are now in this country, if he gets $4,000 a year.

Perhaps my impressions with regard to the pay are derived from the habit of my own State and other States in my locality. My friend from Vermont was for many years the able and excellent chief justice of that State, but I presume his salary was not over $1,500 a year. I do not see the Senators from Rhode Island in their seats, but I believe the chief justice of that State gets about ten or twelve hundred dollars, and I think they pay their Governor about six hundred dollars.

Mr. WILSON. They give their judges $3,500.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then they have raised it. In my own State the salaries of the judges of the supreme court for many years were $1,800; but a few years ago it was carried up to $2,250, I think on the representation of the judges that they could not live unless they had something of their own besides their salary. At the present session of the Legislature there is a dispute whether they shall have $2,500 or $3,000. Our Governor has always had but $1,500, and I believe it has now been raised to $3,000. Undoubtedly the salaries of our State judges will be raised. At the last accounts, the Legislature were hesitating between $2,500 and $3,000 a year. Probably they will fix upon $2,500. The Legislatures are mostly composed of farmers, who cannot imagine why people cannot live on less salaries than these. If I have any objection to the sum of $4,000 for the district judges it is rather because of the prevailing sentiment in my State with reference to salaries than from any other reason. I had fixed in my own mind for the general class about $3,500, which I think is what the district judge in Boston now receives. I do not know, however, that it is enough for Boston.

I simply state these facts for the information of the Senate. I do not feel disposed to contest the matter with a committee that has examined the question carefully and closely and taken into consideration everything that ought to be considered with relation to it; but I should have been better satisfied if they had fixed the general rate at $3,500 instead of $4,000. However, if we fix it at $4,000, the House of Representatives can reduce it if they see fit. If the Senate deem that rate proper, I shall make no strenuous objection.

Mr. STEWART. I do not believe from what I have seen of judicial proceedings that it is economy on the part of the Government to make those salaries less than men who are economical and simple in their habits can live upon with ordinary families. I do not believe that a salary of $4,000 will more than support a family in the style that a lawyer with plain and simple habits going upon the bench should live in. A man who has acquired sufficient reputation to become a judge should be treated properly. Of course he does not expect to get as a judge on the bench as much as he did from his practice, but lawyers are not generally rich, and when they get upon the bench they ought to have enough to make them independent. A dependent judge is a miserable thing. A judge who must necessarily be in debt and dependent upon his friends is not independent as we want the judiciary of the United States to be.

The committee examined this question very thoroughly and made allowance in different localities for the different expenses of living and the different amount of business done, and we equalized the salaries as well as we could. We placed them at what we thought would support an economical family. We did not suppose anybody was going on the bench for the purpose of getting rich, but we desired to place the judiciary in a position where they would be independent provided they were economical and honest. They are the most responsible part of the whole Government, and unless you pay them properly you cannot expect an independent execution of the laws.

I believe it is bad economy to pay too small salaries to those judges, especially when so much business is thrown into the courts by your internal revenue system. The business is so much that these salaries should be raised, and the committee fixed the standard as low as they thought it ought to be.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND.]

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move to amend the amendment of the Senator from Vermont by adding:

And the amount necessary to pay the increased compensation herein provided shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. POLAND. I see no objection to that modification. I accept it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It must be put in order to appropriate the increase provided.

Mr. ANTHONY. Is it intended to prevent an allowance of traveling expenses to the judge of one district who is sent to another district on account of the sickness or inability of the judge of that district?

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is intended to cut off all those allowances.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not know that that is proper; but I shall raise no question about it.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to offer this amendment as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That the salary of each of the judges of the Court of Claims shall be $5,000.

Mr. FESSENDEN. How much is it now?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Four thousand dollars.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am opposed to that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It ought not to be higher than the salary of the judges in this District.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to include the judges of the District of Columbia.

Mr. TRUMBULL. They are already provided for.

Mr. CHANDLER. Do they get over $3,500?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, $4,500 I think. We raised it last year.

Mr. WADE. The chief justice gets $4,500, and the associates $4,000.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We made the compensation of the judges in this District satisfactory to them last year; they have not asked any more now; and the judges of the Court of Claims ought not to receive any more than they do.

Mr. CHANDLER. I withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The judges of the Court of Claims hold their court a great part of the year. They used to meet in October. We altered the law last year, and they meet regularly in December. I do not know how long the term is, but I suppose a good portion of the year. They have to reside here, and the business of the court is very much increased by devolving on it new jurisdiction growing out of the war. I regard the court as a very important one to the Government, and one that makes a great saving to the Government.

I have never myself believed in the investigation of claims against the Government by Congress. I think a bad claim is almost as likely to pass through Congress as a good one. We are not so constituted, these bodies are not so organized, that we can examine and properly pass upon complicated claims. By referring them to this court they undergo judicial investigation; and unless a claim is sustained by evidence and is proper to be allowed there is no probability of its passing the court. The judges are able men; they have to reside here; it occupies all their time; they do nothing else and can do nothing else. It seems to me their salaries ought to be at least $5,000. Their salaries are now what they were fixed at many years ago, $4,000. We considered this subject in connection with the other salaries we were fixing, and were of opinion that it was proper, right, and necessary, to enable these judges to live here in the city of Washington and hold this court, that they should have $5,000 a year. I think it is little enough.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONNESS. After having voted so much money, it will perhaps be acceptable to the Senate to receive an amendment that calls for none. I offer the following as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to direct a geological and topographical exploration of the territory between the Rocky mountains and the Sierra Nevada mountains, including the route or routes of the Pacific railroad: Provided, The same can be done without additional appropriation.

If it be necessary I will explain this amendment, ["Oh, no!"] but I suppose it will not be, and therefore I will spare the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONNESS. The Committee on Mines and Mining instructed me to offer the following amendment, to come in on page 19, after line four hundred and forty-one:

To continue the collection of statistics of mines and mining, $15,000.

This is to continue the collection of statistics of mines and mining. An estimate came from the Department for $25,000 to continue this work. The other House concluded to strike it all out, with I think an unwise economy. However, the report made by the agent selected by the Secretary of the Treasury to do this work was not then spread before the House; its value was not ascertained. No branch of the public service, in my opinion, will interest so many citizens, and none do so much good in proportion to the amount of money expended, as to continue the collection of reliable statistics on this subject. It is useless to make an appropriation for the purpose of getting a single report and let that be the end of it; but it must be continued so that we can lay before the people and before the Congress of the United States assembled here on the eastern frontier some reliable data concerning the resources of the great western country. I do not propose at this time to engage in any lengthy discussion. I hope the Senate will accept the amendment. The committee were unanimous in their recommendation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. When an appropriation of $10,000 was asked for last year it was understood, according to my recollection, that that was all that would be necessary; there was no idea of its continuation; one appropriation was to end the matter.

Mr. CONNESS. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I so understood at the time, and it was so stated and not denied in the House. Now, let us see how my friend stands. The Department which has the thing in charge only asked for $5,000.

Mr. CONNESS. Twenty-five thousand dollars.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The House committee reported $5,000.

Mr. CONNESS. The committee in the other House reported $10,000, and the House refused to accept that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have the impression on my mind very strongly that the report was $5,000.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator is entirely in error. It was only in view of the decision of the House that the committee, in considering it, determined to ask for but $15,000 this year. As to the matter of collecting statistics for one year and then stopping, that idea never entered anybody's head, I suppose; certainly not mine.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I could not see last year what the necessity was of appointing an agent to go about and collect statistics in the mining country, and how he could do it better there than by the returns that were made on the subject to the different Departments here.

It looked to me very much like creating a place for somebody to do something. I confess I do not understand the matter so well as my honorable friend from California, because he is there upon the spot; but it did not impress itself upon my mind with very much force as a good way to get at it to have a traveling agent to collect statistics, at an expense of $10,000 a year, and constantly growing; $10,000 last year, $25,000 next. How many agents does the honorable Senator propose to have? How many men are to be employed in this business of collecting statistics? Is $25,000 to pay for one, or is he to have a corps of assistants? Is this to grow up into a bureau? It seems to be constantly growing. The appropriation is more than double what was proposed last year. I should like to know a little more about it. I confess it does not strike me favorably.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, it is an unfortunate circumstance that a statesman of the character, reputation, and ability of the honorable Senator from Maine should so regard a question affecting one of the greatest interests of his country. I do not say this except in a literal sense; it is a matter of real regret with me. I have said to gentlemen on this side of the continent again and again that if they would go from this side to the other side of the continent and ascertain by personal experience how big a country they have, get a glimpse of its interests, its resources, catch the inspiration of its necessities, the effect would be to at least relieve us who come from that distant region, endeavoring to represent it and make known its wants here. I was much pleased this year at the beginning of our session to meet the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] who is always exact, always thorough, always intelligent in his statesmanship, but from whom we of that distant region had met rather economical action, and to hear him say that he had gone out into the West since the last adjournment of Congress, gone to the Rocky mountains, to Denver, and that he came back with an impression widened beyond measure as compared with that with which he went there. If I could only prevail upon my honorable friend from Maine to come to our country during some of the vacations, there is nothing in the world that would please us so well as to give him a welcome there, to make him acquainted with that country, with its necessities, with its great facts. He would not after that ask me here to tell him whether one agent or two or ten should be employed in collecting statistics of mines and mining; but seeing would give him the whole case.

Now, Mr. President, he makes himself acquainted as he remains here at the center of the civilization of the continent with our productions as they come from the Mint with the stamp of the Government upon them. When they assume that shape he is very glad to hear of the millions; but his mind is hardly ever now carried to the thousands and hundreds of thousands who are delving to produce those millions. A knowledge of them, of the means by which the grand result is produced, is not spread abroad here. Who can oppose the collection and diffusion of such facts?

Sir, if I were seeking to get a grab at the Treasury here in behalf of the country I represent I should be ashamed of myself. In regard to this very proposition, it will be remembered that when the honorable Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] and myself came here we at once stopped an appropriation that nobody took any notice of, that was being made annually, that had entered into the estimates to the extent of $15,000 for the Interior Department, connected with investigations concerning mining, and which never profited the Government a copper. We saw that it was wasted and thrown away, and we caused the appropriation to be stricken out. Application after application has been made to me as a Senator from the Pacific coast, since I came here, to aid in the establishment of what is called a mining bureau at Washington. The newspapers in my country have taken it up and they have demanded it year after year.

The honorable Senator from Nevada has once introduced a bill for the establishment of it, and that bill was referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining. I will say now, openly in the Senate, what I said to him connected with that bill and that proposition, no matter whence it came. As a Senator representing the Pacific coast, and feeling a deep and abiding interest in mining, I would favor the establishment of a mining bureau in Washington as much as I would a pest-house near my dwelling. To duplicate some of your bureaus in Washington and give it official charge of the business of mining, to be controlled by men who know nothing about it, who perhaps never saw a mine, and who should have official authority to speak for mines and mining and miners, always, in my opinion, threatened the mines and mining with the greatest possible danger. Besides, as was suggested by the honorable Senator from Maine, once established it would grow into an institution remarkable for the worthless and voluminous publications that would go out from it and the amount of money that would be spent in giving them publicity, and in the payment of chiefs and clerks and various other dependents. I never felt like spending the public money for the purpose of establishing an institution of that kind. And I beg the honorable Senator from Maine to believe that we only suggest what we know by our experience will tend to the public good, and that we make these recommendations in the public behalf. I now repeat publicly the invitation I have extended to the honorable Senator in private, to come out and see us—

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like very much to do it.

Mr. CONNESS. His eyes will be filled with the wonders he shall see, and he will come back, I guaranty it, with a good appetite, having been able to gratify it, too, in the mean time; he will come back with health and strength, he will come back a friend to that portion of his country which in my opinion ought to invite his greatest affections and regard. I need not add the suggestion of my honorable friend near me [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] that it is a section which now admires him, for wherever the American name is known the name of the honorable Senator from Maine is known, understood, and appreciated.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, from my examination of this subject in committee I am induced to vote for the amendment which has been offered. I am not at all disposed to waste the public money upon speculative projects; but from an examination of the report of the gentleman who was selected for the discharge of the duty contemplated by the appropriation of last year I am induced to think that this work is in proper hands. I consider his report to be not only elaborate but valuable, one of these few productions of an official character issued by this Government which possess a practical value as promotive of the interests of this country. Mr. J. Ross Browne, who was selected by the Secretary of the Treasury, devoted himself with great diligence to the performance of the duties assigned him; and the report which he has prepared, and which is now in print and accessible to members of Congress, is one of great value. It contains information of the first importance with reference to the mining interest of this country, a new interest. I think that a small amount of money devoted to the prosecution of investigations upon this subject and to their publication is much better devoted than duties such as we find in the tariff bill to protect domestic industry or any other outlays or burdens imposed upon the people contemplating the development of the resources of this country.

The appropriation was reduced by the committee very considerably below the amount which the proper officers of the Treasury thought appropriate to this object. We were all convinced that this work was in good hands. Now, sir, if it was to run a bureau at Washington, if it was merely to accumulate certain figures here, if it was to give certain individuals a place and a salary, I should be the last member of this body to vote for it; but I believe that the gentleman who has charge of this work is competent to the duties which have been charged upon him, and that we shall get valuable results, and I speak with reference to the work which he has already accomplished. He has traveled extensively; he has organized this great work; he has assistants in different Territories and States of this country. The work is going on, and in my judgment it will be a public misfortune, a public calamity, to arrest it at this stage.

Why, sir, this mining interest is growing to be one of the leading interests of this country; it is magnificent in the present extent; it is still more magnificent in its promise of the future. So far as the increase of wealth in our country is concerned we must rely upon it to assist us in bearing the burdens of our public indebtedness. We must rely upon it in the future as one of those interests which the Government ought to have under its fostering care and its fostering protection.

This small appropriation, therefore, in my judgment is devoted to a most useful object; it will pass into proper hands; we shall get valuable results from it. It is not open to question or doubt such as attend many enterprises which are pressed upon our attention.

Mr. STEWART. With regard to this report, I have to say that although there are some little inaccuracies in the estimates—and they only pretend to be estimates where there are inaccuracies—take the work as a whole it contains more information upon the subject of our mining resources than has been obtained or exists in Washington from all other sources. More has been collected in the space of sixty days by an experienced man who had traveled and who availed himself of the researches of others than you had here before; and there is more demand for this information than anything else you print in Washington.

I think I have received at least one hundred letters inquiring for this report and desiring a copy of it. Those who will read it will see that he has commenced to collect the general information so much needed here. Now, there is very little said here and very little time occupied with regard to the mining interests of this country, an interest that is producing $100,000,000 per annum; an interest that is extended over a thousand miles square of territory; an interest where there are to be some eight or ten large States eventually, comprising most of the territory of the United States that is now not inhabited; an interest which invites immigration from abroad more than any other; an interest which has sustained the credit of this country during the war—for I undertake to say that the credit of this country could not have been sustained but for this annual product of gold and silver; an interest which has in fact almost revolutionized the whole commercial system of the world, changed values, and is to change them further, and enable us to pay our public debt. We owe over three thousand millions in gold, or nearly that. If we make gold and silver abundant it is much easier for the people to pay it; and if you let the people of the East and of Europe know where the gold is they will come and dig it.

We have an efficient man who has done good service. We have the work to show you. It is worth ten times its cost. It will increase the products in such a manner as to benefit the country more than a hundred-fold the cost every year. It is here to show for itself. It is no great organization that is going to incumber the Government. It is in the hands of an intelligent gentleman who takes pride in it, who is peculiarly fitted for it, who is a great traveler and explorer, who is ready and willing to avail himself of the information that exists in that country. We ask the Senate to let this small appropriation continue to be made, and let this work go on and collect information with regard to that vast region, so that there may be some intelligent knowledge upon the subject, some knowledge of the facts in the community and in Congress to guide legislation. We think this is but reasonable. On questions that affected the East, on questions that affected manufactures, I think the Pacific has been liberal, although she has no manufactures. My State has none. We vote your tariffs, and we vote in that way additional prices upon ourselves. We do it because we believe it is for the interest of the whole country, because we think the interests of the country will be thereby advanced. We ask you to aid us in carrying on explorations so as to learn what we have, because we believe that will benefit the whole country.

As was justly remarked by the Senator from California, when he and I came here and ascertained that $15,000 annually was being appropriated for this purpose, and no information was being obtained, we asked you to stop it. If the person who is now engaged in this work, Mr. Brown, should fail to do his duty, we shall be the first to find it out; if good results are not produced, we shall be the first to ascertain that fact and ask that it be stopped. It is no job, no favoritism. We simply ask that this information be collected and laid before the country for the country's good. We think it a very small amount. We ought to have the amount recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury. He has examined the matter and recommends an appropriation of $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I offer the following amendment as an additional section to the bill: And be it further enacted, That the salary of the Chief Clerk of the Senate shall be $4,000, and that of the Sergeant-at-Arms $3,500 per annum.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will ask whether that is from any committee?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will state that it is offered as coming from the Committee on Contingent Expenses. I do not suppose it is necessary to say anything on this subject, because the Senate is entirely familiar with the duties discharged by each one of these officers, and I do not know that it is necessary to comment upon them in their presence. I have been fully persuaded—I was at the last session—that these salaries are too low and ought to be increased. Considering the responsibilities that devolve upon the Sergeant-at-Arms, who has the supervision of this entire portion of the building, and the great labor that is performed by the Chief Clerk of the Senate, it seems to me that these sums are little enough.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What does the Secretary receive?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Something over four thousand dollars a year.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Do I understand the Senator to say it is from a committee? I really wish to know whether this amendment is in order. If it comes from the Committee on Contingent Expenses it is in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly it comes from the Committee on Contingent Expenses. All the members of the committee are here.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not doubt it if the Senator says so.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADE. I move to amend the bill on page 3, lines fifty-eight and fifty-nine, by striking out the words "in the Daily Globe;" so that the clause will read:

For reporting and printing the proceedings for the first session of the Fortieth Congress, $21,250.

The object of the amendment is to prevent our being bound and tied up at this time to make the appropriation to the Globe. It is not necessary, as this is an appropriation for the Fortieth Congress. There is no objection to the amendment, I believe.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is a very important amendment to be made, I think. We have a contract with the Globe under laws for the publication of our proceedings. I do not know whether it is proper that we should make different arrangements.

Mr. WADE. I do not think there is any such contract with the Globe as binds us to have the congressional proceedings published in it, and if there is it need not be foreclosed that I know of so as to bind us entirely to it. We do not know; perhaps they would not be willing to carry on their contract.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have not looked into it at all; I do not know.

Mr. WADE. I believe there is no objection to the amendment. I believe it is understood that we ought not to bind ourselves just now. We have agreed that the Fortieth Congress shall assemble immediately after this one expires, and it will be time enough then to fix this, and there may be some reasons why it should be done then. In the mean time the appropriation can stand, but it need not foreclose it. If we are bound by a contract to have it go to the Globe, then it must go there if the appropriation be made; but I do not think we are. It may be that we may want to make some different arrangement. It is not necessary that we should be bound in this way just now. I hope there will be no objection to the amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should certainly object to the amendment, if no one else does, until I have looked at it. If the Senator from Ohio has examined the laws and the contract with the Globe by which these publications are made—

Mr. WADE. The next Congress can do that.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The next Congress cannot do it. We meet on the 4th of March, and what arrangements have we got for publishing the proceedings of Congress?

Mr. BROWN. It will be done by somebody.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Who is to do it? If there is a contract with any party to do it that party is the one to do it.

Mr. BROWN. It does not follow that we must put it in an appropriation.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think it does follow that it should be put in an appropriation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask Senators to allow me to make a suggestion. It is understood, and we may as well speak out, that there is a difficulty between the reporters of the Senate and the Globe, and such is the difficulty that we may at any time be left without reporters. I am not satisfied where the right of that matter is. If we agree to this clause as it stands both for the Senate and the House we are concluded, because afterward that cannot be altered; and the appropriation is made throughout for the Globe. Now, it may be, very probably will be, on examination, that it may be advisable to make the appropriation precisely as we have made it heretofore; but I think myself, considering the position we are in, we ought not to agree with the House so as to tie our hands upon this bill at once until we have looked into it a little. It only requires a little delay.

I suggest, therefore, to my friend from Ohio, as I should like to take the bill out of committee to-night, that he withdraw the amendment and let us take the bill out of committee, and the same amendment can be moved to-morrow, if necessary, in the Senate after we have looked at it a little more, when the chairman of the Committee on Printing, the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY,] is here. He is not in good health, and is not here this evening. We can then ascertain more about it. At present, by striking this out, it does not follow that the House would concur, and in the mean time the proper inquiries could be made and the proper information obtained. If the Senator from Ohio—I am very glad he has brought the question up—will let us take the bill out of committee, and let this matter go over until the morning, when the bill is in the Senate he can make the same motion, and then, if we are not bound by any contract, it can be better considered than it would be to-night.

Mr. WADE. I have no objection to that. I will say to the Senator from Illinois that there is nothing binding in what I propose. I do not think, from the slight examination that I have given the subject of our arrangement with the Globe, that we are in any way bound. I think it will be found that we are at liberty to make such arrangements about the printing of the debates as Congress shall think proper to make. I do not think we are bound; but if we were bound what I propose is no repudiation of our contract. I do nothing inconsistent with it. I only prevent that conclusion being fastened upon us if we are not bound. But I will bring up the question in the morning. I would just as lief bring it up in the Senate then as now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio withdraw his amendment?

Mr. WADE. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will ask the consent of the Senate to add to the amendment proposed by me a few moments ago in regard to the salary of the Chief Clerk and Sergeant-at-Arms—

That the amount necessary to pay the additional salary be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Those words will be added if there be no objection.

Mr. CRESWELL. On page 10, line two hundred and thirty-seven, I move to insert after the word "purchasing" the words "periodicals and;" so that the clause will read:

For purchasing periodicals and files of the leading newspapers for said Library, [Library of Congress.] $1,500.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would be well enough perhaps to let further proceedings on the bill go over until to-morrow morning, as it is now in the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to take up House bill No. 344—the Niagara ship-canal bill. ["No! No!"] Let us take it up and then adjourn.

Mr. BROWN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at four minutes past ten o'clock p. m.) adjourned.

W. Fletcher until they shall have respectively attained the age of sixteen years.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

QUARANTINE IN THE PORT OF NEW YORK.

Mr. DAVIS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of New York, relative to quarantine at the port of New York:

"Whereas at the last session of the Legislature concurrent resolutions were passed by the Senate and Assembly asking the national authorities to place hulks and vessels gratuitously and temporarily at the disposal of the commissioners of quarantine of this State, to afford them means for protecting the country against the spread of the terrible scourge of cholera, which had then appeared in the midst of us; and whereas pursuant to said request and under the authority of a joint resolution of Congress, passed on the 24th of March, 1866, the Secretary of War placed the steamship Illinois, and the Secretary of the Navy placed the sloop-of-war Portsmouth and Saratoga, at the disposal of said commissioners, by means of which they were greatly aided during the past year in confining the ravages of the pestilence to the waters of the harbor, thus probably saving the lives of many of our citizens; and whereas our State is still destitute of any suitable place for the temporary detention of those arriving in our harbor who have been exposed to contagious diseases, but are not actually sick; and it is believed by many that another summer will bring with it another visitation of the cholera more severe and dangerous than that through which we have just passed; and whereas the said resolution of Congress is limited in its effect to the period of one year from the time of its passage: Therefore,

Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be, and they are hereby, requested to use their best endeavors to secure the passage by that body of an act or resolution directing the Secretaries of War and the Navy to allow the commissioners of quarantine to continue the use of the vessels aforesaid for quarantine purposes during the present year, and also to place at their disposal such other hulks and vessels as they may require for that purpose, in addition to those above mentioned, and which may not be immediately required by the United States for other uses."

Mr. DAVIS, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution respecting quarantine in the port of New York; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution, which was read at length, provides for continuing for two years the authority conferred by the joint resolution of March 24, 1866, upon the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy respectively, to place, in their discretion, gratuitously at the disposal of the commissioners of quarantine, or the proper authorities of any of the ports of the United States, to be used by them temporarily for quarantine purposes, such vessels or hulks belonging to the United States as are not required for other uses.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DAVIS moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CLAIMS OF NEW MEXICO.

Mr. CHAVES, by unanimous consent, presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of New Mexico, asking for the appointment of a commission to settle claims growing out of the Texas invasion of that Territory during the rebellion, and also asking an appropriation for the payment of the same; which were referred to the Committee on the Territories, and ordered to be printed:

To the Honorable the Congress of the United States:

Your memorialists, the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, would most respectfully represent that during the Texas invasion of this Territory many thousand dollars' worth of property was destroyed by the rebels, and our citizens have, in response to a proclamation of the late Governor, Henry Connelly, filed their claims in the office of the Secretary of the Territory.

Your memorialists would most respectfully ask your honorable body to appoint a commission to settle these claims and to make an appropriation sufficient to pay them.

And your memorialists, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Territory be and is hereby, directed to forward a copy of the foregoing to the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives, with a request that they will lay them before their respective Houses, and also a copy to Hon. J. Francisco Chaves, our Delegate in Congress.

MTGUEL E. PINO,

President of the Council.

R. M. STEPHENS,

Speaker House of Representatives.

Approved, January 18, 1867.

W. F. M. ARMY,

Acting Governor.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA. TERRITORY OF NEW MEXICO.

I, W. F. M. Army, Secretary and Acting Governor of New Mexico, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy, which is on file in my office, as passed by the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of New Mexico at its present session.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto signed my name and affixed my official seal this 18th day of January, A. D. 1867.

W. F. M. ARMY,

Secretary and Acting Governor New Mexico.

LOANS OF GOLD.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask unanimous consent to make a report from the Committee on Retrenchment.

Leave was granted.

Mr. SCHENCK. The joint and select Committee on Retrenchment, to which was referred a resolution directing an inquiry into alleged loans of gold by officers of the Government, have instructed me to make a report, accompanied with a mass of testimony. I may state for the information of the House the conclusion of the committee, which is, that "there is no foundation whatever for the statements, allegations, and charges contained in or implied by the House resolution of January 15." I move that the report and accompanying testimony be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

GOVERNMENT OF INSURRECTIONARY STATES.

The SPEAKER announced as the first business in order the bill (H. R. No. 1143) to provide for the more efficient government of the insurrectionary States, on which Mr. STEVENS was entitled to the floor.

Mr. FINCK. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether it is his purpose to press this bill to a vote to-day?

Mr. STEVENS. Well, sir, I have not come to any definite determination except to say that I desire a vote as early as possible, and unless there are some circumstances which require longer delay I should desire to have the vote reached this evening.

Mr. FINCK. This is, in my judgment, the most important measure that has ever been presented to an American Congress; and I suggest to the gentleman and to the House that some time ought to be allowed, not merely for its discussion, but for its examination. I therefore propose that, if it meet the favor of the gentleman and the House, we postpone this bill, after the gentleman gets through with his speech, until Monday, so that a vote may be taken after something like deliberate discussion. We are not prepared to go into the discussion to-day.

Mr. STEVENS. All I can say with regard to that suggestion is that, considering the period of the session to which we have arrived, and the difficulty of passing a bill of this kind through the Senate, where there are no means of restricting debate, I do not feel justified in consenting to any postponement of this bill. I trust that when the bill is taken up we shall proceed without interruption to the end of the debate. I do not feel disposed to restrict debate or to prevent any gentleman from being heard. On our side, there is, I trust, no disposition to occupy much time in debate, but to yield the time, to a great extent, to gentlemen on the other side. I hope so, though I have had no understanding of that kind.

Mr. FINCK. I suggest to the gentleman that, in order to discuss this measure properly, there ought to be some time for its examination. We cannot this morning enter upon the discussion in such a manner as we would like to do.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I merely wish to suggest, in connection with the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FINCK,] that I concur in the opinion expressed by him that this is a very important measure. At the same time, I appreciate the fact stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania that we have arrived at that period of the session when a measure of this kind ought to be proceeded with, avoiding all unnecessary delay.

I would suggest, therefore, that to-day and to-night, if thought proper, be given to the discussion of this measure, and that the vote be taken to-morrow.

Mr. LE BLOND. I would like to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Iowa as well as to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. It has already been said, and I think it is conceded upon both sides of the House, this is, perhaps, the most important bill ever presented to the American Congress. If that be so, I am certain gentlemen on this, and I presume also on that side of the House, could not be expected suddenly to act on it, unless indeed the majority have in their outside Congress deliberated on this measure and come to some conclusion on it. A while ago the gentleman from Pennsylvania, speaking I suppose on behalf of the gentlemen on that side of the House, said none there were desirous of speaking on this proposition. I submit, on a bill of this magnitude, presented to members at twelve o'clock, to go into debate on it at this time is next to impossible.

It strikes, as the gentleman suggests, and as it must be conceded, at the civil governments in those States. It ignores State lines. It ignores those States in every particular. It destroys their civil governments. It breaks down the judicial system in those States.

Mr. SPALDING. I object to the discussion of this matter in this irregular way.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is in order. The Clerk will read the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

"While a member is occupying the floor he may yield it to another for explanation of the pending measure as well as for personal explanation."

The SPEAKER. The pending motion is to recommit this bill, which opens up the discussion of its merits. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is entitled to the floor, and yields to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GARFIELD. Would it not be sufficient to allow to-day and this evening for debate?

Mr. LE BLOND. That is what I am speaking about. I am trying to show the impossibility of our being urged to speak on this subject, one of such magnitude, as it is desired.

Mr. RAYMOND. The gentleman will allow me a moment. I would like to make a suggestion in regard to debate, on this subject, which possibly may meet the concurrence of both the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Pennsylvania. It seems to be agreed on all sides that this is a question of so much importance it should not be acted on without a chance for debate; yet I think it is also agreed on both sides of the House debate should not be wholly without restriction of some kind. What is wanted is an opportunity to state views of individual members on the bill, not as I understand to make full and exhaustive speeches on the whole subject. I suggest the discussion begin in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, or otherwise, restricting it to twenty minutes or a half an hour each.

A MEMBER. Fifteen minutes.

Mr. RAYMOND. Let me say on that point I think the question involves principle, and it is difficult to make a statement in ten minutes that will answer the purpose. Let the debate commence without restriction, without fixing when the final vote shall be taken, and when it becomes unimportant let the gentleman from Pennsylvania call the previous question. I think we can close it to-day, or reach a point when all will be willing to take the vote.

Mr. LE BLOND. I wish to say to gentlemen on the other side that we are not disposed to talk on this subject at unreasonable length. We do not ask it; but we do not feel like going into debate at this time without proper examination of the bill. Let us fix a day—as suggested by my colleague, next Monday—when the vote on this bill will be taken. Until then allow those who wish to speak on it. As to limiting each one to ten or twenty minutes on a bill of this magnitude for one I cannot consent; other gentlemen may do as they see proper. It does not comport with my idea of legislation. A decent respect to the people we represent, a decent respect to the Congress of the United States in the eyes of the civilized world, would require this bill should have more deliberation than even that proposed by the gentleman from New York. Sir, I have some desire that the civilized world shall come to the conclusion that we do at least deliberate upon bills of importance.

Mr. STEVENS. I suppose this talk comes out of my time.

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. RAYMOND. With the consent of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I will reduce my suggestion to the form of a motion: I move that the debate now proceed, each speech being limited to twenty minutes.

Mr. ROGERS. I object.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I object unless we allow the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HISE] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania an hour each. [Laughter.]

Mr. FINCK. I desire to renew my proposition to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that after he gets through with his speech the bill be postponed until Monday, and then let the discussion go on during Monday and Tuesday, and take the vote on Tuesday.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, do I understand that the objection to the proposition of the gentleman from New York comes from the other side of the House or from this side?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WENTWORTH] objected.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I only objected unless my friend from Kentucky [Mr. HISE] should have a chance to speak one hour. [Laughter.] I withdraw the objection.

Mr. ROGERS. I object to any arrangement of that sort.

Mr. HISE. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. STEVENS. I must decline.

Mr. FINCK. Do I understand the gentleman to decline my proposition?

Mr. STEVENS. I cannot accept it.

Mr. MAYNARD. I make a suggestion to my friend from Pennsylvania, that we devote two night sessions to debating this subject—this evening and to-morrow evening.

Mr. STEVENS. I cannot agree that this should go over more than one night.

Mr. MAYNARD. Well, say to-night.

Mr. STEVENS. I have no objection to to-night.

The SPEAKER. The motion for a night session can be made at any time.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask the gentlemen on the other side if that will be satisfactory to them?

Mr. LE BLOND. I can only speak for myself, and shall only speak for myself. I have already indicated to the gentleman that a proposition of that kind would not be accepted, for the reason that we have had no time to examine the bill and to prepare any remarks upon it. The proposition of my colleague [Mr. FINCK] does seem to me to be reasonable. I know the gentleman who introduced this bill makes this remark: that we are coming to the close of the session and—

Mr. STEVENS. I only gave way to my friend from Tennessee to make a motion.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. MAYNARD. I make the motion that we take a recess to-day from half past four to half past seven o'clock; and I will simply remark that if there is anything we do understand it is the subject of reconstruction, and all we want to understand now is the special provisions of the bill before us.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask whether that motion includes "for debate only."

The SPEAKER. That motion would require unanimous consent. Is there objection to limiting the evening session to debate only?

Mr. GRINNELL. I object.

RESOLUTIONS OF PENNSYLVANIA LEGISLATURE.

Mr. SCOFIELD, by unanimous consent, presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, asking for a reduction of the tax on petroleum; which were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a personal matter that I intended to have noticed some days ago.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. STEVENS. To a personal matter? Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman from Ohio making a personal explanation? The Chair hears none.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, in a service in this body for a period of some eight years I have never before asked the indulgence of the House to make a personal explanation. I do so this morning with reluctance, because as a rule the notice or the reading of such an article as I propose to notice is what sensational correspondents most desire. But for the fact that the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] is charged with being in a conspiracy with General Butler and myself to stab General Grant I would not now call the attention of the House to the article which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"It will be remembered that about a month ago Mr. ASHLEY offered a resolution in the House of Representatives directing the Judiciary Committee to inquire if any officer of the United States had been guilty of high crimes or misdemeanors within the meaning of the Constitution, or had conspired to subvert the Constitution of the United States. This looked at the time, certainly to me, and I think to most others, rather like the evasion of a direct charge against the President than an attempt to make it more comprehensive, and to include others besides that unhappy gentleman. I know that most of those who referred to the subject in conversation at the time so regarded it. There was one gentleman, however, on the floor of the House of Representatives who, as if by inspiration, saw through it the instant it was offered, and construed aright the poisonous malice it concealed under an apparently harmless coating of words. The presentation of such a resolution, whose coming had not been heralded by any previous announcement or intention, and was known but to half a dozen members, very naturally threw the House into a temporary confusion, and created quite a stir on the Republican side. What the public already knows on the subject is only what transpired in the way of regular business, but the by-play, that did not come under that head, is the important part that shows the animus of the movement.

"As soon as the resolution was read, Mr. BINGHAM jumped from his seat and went over to ASHLEY, to whom he addressed some very strong language, asking him what he meant by such a proposition as that, and why he did not frame it to apply to the President only, instead of making it a drag net to include every officer of the Government. ASHLEY hesitated a while, affected a knavish smile, and replied that he 'guessed it was all right.' 'No, it isn't all right,' said BINGHAM. 'It's a stab at General Grant, and no such malicious thing shall go through the House if I can help it.' 'Suppose it does include Grant,' said ASHLEY; 'can't we investigate his conduct too; and can't we impeach him if he has been guilty under the resolution?' BINGHAM looked at ASHLEY a moment, and replied in nervous wrath: 'ASHLEY, you're a fool. Don't you know that you can't impeach any but a civil officer of the Government under the Constitution?' By this time quite a group had collected where the colloquy was being held, and THAD. STEVENS, scenting a breeze, had come over to avert a storm. Addressing him, BINGHAM asked what was the meaning of this damnable assault upon General Grant. 'Oh, nothing,' said STEVENS, in his insidious way, 'only we want to investigate some charges recently made against him. I don't see why Grant should be free from investigation any more than Johnson. He's just as bad as Johnson.' BINGHAM again denounced what he termed very aptly 'a foul conspiracy against the chief officer of the Army of the Republic,' and he gave the few friends of the resolution who were around him fair warning that if they passed it, he should expose the cowardly proceeding as it deserved.

"By this time the resolution had 'gone over,' as the parliamentary phrase is, from a refusal of the House to suspend the rules. Quiet had been restored on the floor, and the business of the day was quietly proceeding. BINGHAM addressed ASHLEY, in presence of several members, in language like this: 'Tell the honest truth now, who instigated that resolution?' 'Why, what makes you think it wasn't my own?' inquired ASHLEY. 'Because,' said BINGHAM, 'I know there is too much cunning in it for you, and I'll bet you anything you dare that THAD. STEVENS and Ben. Butler either wrote it or dictated its spirit.' ASHLEY again protested against BINGHAM's right to question the authorship, and BINGHAM again repeated that there was too much craft and design about it for anybody but STEVENS or Butler. What from BINGHAM's earnestness and ASHLEY's faintly disguised equivocation, the dispute had become quite interesting, and a number of Radical members had collected around the disputants. After some further bantering and badgering on BINGHAM's part, ASHLEY confessed that 'STEVENS had a little to do with it, and Butler had a little to do with it, and that one of its principal objects was to give Butler an opportunity of making and proving certain charges against General Grant.'"

Mr. EGGLESTON. I would ask the gentleman from what paper this was read?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. It is from the National Intelligencer of Saturday last, and purports to be from the Washington correspondence of the Cincinnati Commercial, dated January 26, 1867.

Mr. EGGLESTON. Then I rise to a question of order and object to the gentleman proceeding.

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent has been granted to the gentleman from Ohio to make a personal explanation, and he is entitled to one hour to make an explanation.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, of all the stupid falsehoods manufactured and sent forth from this city by reckless, unscrupulous maligners, this story in which my name is made to figure is the most absurd.

If the House will indulge me for a moment I will state the history of that resolution. And here, sir, I will say that up to the hour when my attention was called to this article I had never, either directly or indirectly, in writing or otherwise, passed a word with General Butler on the subject of impeachment, nor had I with any one authorized or claiming to speak for him; indeed, I did not even know what his views were on the subject, except by newspaper report, until a week or two ago I read his celebrated speech at my desk here in the House.

Now, sir, upon this question of impeachment, I have had my own views since my first interview with the acting President, immediately after the assassination of President Lincoln. The conduct of the acting President since that time has only confirmed me in the impressions I then formed. I believe that he ought to be impeached for the usurpation of powers that belong under the Constitution to Congress.

Mr. RADFORD. I rise to a question of order. I submit that he is not making a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] asked to have read a letter in regard to his resolution on impeachment in which his name was associated with those of General Butler and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] He is now exposing the facts of the case in his own manner.

Mr. RADFORD. I supposed that the gentleman was permitted to make a personal explanation, and not to make an attack upon the President.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not see that he has as yet transgressed the rules of the House. He has confined his remarks thus far to the question of impeachment, in connection with which his personal explanation is made.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I was saying when the gentleman made his point of order that I had formed my own views about this matter and why I had formed them. I was saying that I was for the impeachment of the acting President because he had usurped powers which under the Constitution belonged exclusively to Congress for his infidelity to his official oath, in that he had failed to execute the laws; for his treason to the nation, in that he had entered into a conspiracy to resuscitate the "lost cause" and establish the late rebels in power; thus rendering valueless the victories of the Union armies and revolutionizing the Government of the United States; and being in possession of information which satisfied me that he was guilty of other acts which in contemplation of the Constitution were high crimes and misdemeanors, I said to several gentlemen that unless some other member introduced a resolution inquiring into the conduct of the President before the holidays I should be compelled to do it.

I delayed until a few days before our adjournment for the holidays hoping some one would move in the matter. At that time I intended to offer a resolution substantially like the one which was finally adopted by the House naming the President.

On consultation with some gentlemen it was thought a resolution more general in its character and not naming the President would obtain a larger and more united vote. For that purpose, and for that purpose alone, I drew the resolution in the form in which it was offered. After I had drawn up the resolution the first gentleman to whom I read it was the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, now absent, [Mr. WASHBURNE.] I afterward read it to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] and to two or three others, in order to obtain their judgment upon it and learn whether they would vote for it, and to be satisfied that they were clearly of the opinion that under such a resolution we had the right to investigate the charges which I proposed to prefer against the President. Certainly nothing was farther from my thoughts, or the thoughts of any gentleman with whom I consulted, than to inflict a stab in the dark upon General Grant. If that had been my purpose I would hardly have read the resolution to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURNE.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] for information only—and it seems to me that it is more pertinent to the subject which is embraced in the article read from the Clerk's desk than anything else would be—whether he did or did not have a conversation, similar to the one narrated in the correspondence, with the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM.] I think that subject would interest us more than the other.

Mr. ASHLEY of Ohio. I will come to that directly; if I do not, the gentleman can catechize me after I get through.

Now, it is well known to every member of this House that neither General Grant nor any officer in the Army could be arraigned by this House on articles of impeachment and tried by the Senate under that resolution. If that be so, then the charge that such was my purpose, or the purpose of any gentleman with whom I consulted, is so stupid that I dismiss it with the contempt it deserves.

I consulted the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] only in regard to the phraseology of the resolution which I had drawn up, and I made an interlineation or two in the resolution at his suggestion. After I came to my desk I tore up that resolution and wrote a new one, omitting what I thought was unimportant. That resolution, redrawn, and seen by no one but myself, was the one I sent to the Clerk's desk for action by the House. This is the history of that resolution. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have only to add that the language alleged to have been used by my colleague [Mr. BINGHAM] was never in my hearing, in this House or out of it, addressed to me. Nor did I hear the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] use the remarks which are attributed to him in the article which I have caused to be read.

In making this explanation, Mr. Speaker, I have yielded my own personal objections to the wishes of others. I regret that I have taken up so much of the time of the House in correcting a publication which is so absurd that it seemed to me to carry upon its face its own refutation.

Mr. STEVENS. In connection with what has been said, as my name has been mentioned, I desire to say one word if there is no objection.

Mr. DAWSON. I object.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Can I not yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS?]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] had resumed his seat, having ended his remarks. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] can make a personal explanation only by unanimous consent, and the gentleman on the right of the Chair, his colleague, [Mr. DAWSON,] objects.

Mr. SPALDING. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the bill for the more efficient government of the insurrectionary States.

Mr. STEVENS. I suppose I can speak upon the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is entitled to the floor upon the regular order.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I hope unanimous consent will be given to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] to speak upon the subject referred to by his colleague, [Mr. ASHLEY.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] has not asked unanimous consent for that purpose.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I ask it for him.

Mr. SPALDING. I object.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have no desire to say anything upon the subject. [Laughter.]

GOVERNMENT OF INSURRECTIONARY STATES.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1143) to provide for the more efficient government of the insurrectionary States.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I thought that in the course of this debate I heard something said with regard to an alleged conversation between the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] and myself. If I was right in my hearing of what was alleged to have been said by myself and other gentlemen—

Mr. ROGERS. I rise to a point of order. I submit that the remarks of the gentleman are not confined to the question before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order. The gentleman must confine himself to the pending bill.

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, sir; I am confining myself to the bill; and finishing my sentence, as I should have finished it if I had not been called to order, I say that the statement referred to is wholly false. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, in order that gentlemen on the other side may not suppose that there is any intention on our part—I ought, perhaps, to say on my part, for I am not authorized to speak for anybody else—to do them injustice or to deny them the opportunity for a full discussion so far as the circumstances will allow, I will try to confine my own remarks to but a few moments. At this period of the session any unnecessary delay must be fatal to the bill, even if we have not already allowed so much time to go by that it will not be possible for the bill to become a law before the close of the session. Besides, this subject has been already discussed fully in almost every phase in which the question of reconstruction can be handled. I do not perceive what can be gained on our side—I simply make the suggestion; my friends must decide for themselves—I do not perceive what can be gained on our side by further discussion to any considerable extent; and I must take this occasion to say that, after the bill has been discussed through to-day and this evening, I shall feel myself justified, and indeed bound by my duty, to ask the House at one o'clock to-morrow to sustain the previous question.

Sir, this is a bill for the purpose of putting under governments ten States now without governments. They are States of the late so-called confederacy, as I have called them. Other gentlemen have contended that they were States nowhere. I have differed with these gentlemen in this respect. I have said that these were perfect States with perfect organizations under a foreign government. It is at any rate certain that those States now have no governments which are known to the Constitution or laws of the United States of America; that for nearly two years they have been lying in a disorganized condition. Nearly two years ago the armies of a government calling itself the confederate States of America were conquered and the government was dispersed. By the law of nations the conqueror after that had a right to say exactly what government should be administered over them or by them, keeping always within the law of nations. The conqueror had a right either to extend his own laws over those conquered States, or if no action was taken by the conqueror, then by the law of nations the old institutions were permitted to run on for the purpose of administering the local laws until such time as the conquering party should act. I have merely stated the condition of those States according to the well-known principles of the law of nations. There having been no action on the part of the conqueror, the law of nations gave the institutions then existing that kind of power for domestic administration which is exercised by every conquered province until the conqueror provides for a better government.

The reason why no governments have been provided, and they have been permitted to go on under the general law of nations, is because there has been difficulty in harmonizing the councils of the dominant party. The executive department has attempted to enact new laws, to establish new regulations, to authorize the conquered territory to be represented in Congress, without the action of the sovereign power of the nation; and that sovereign power has repudiated the authority which has attempted to place States within those conquered provinces, and has waited and waited patiently in the hope that some arrangement could be come to by which there should be harmony in our councils, and the kind of government necessary there might be agreed upon without collision. That hope has failed, and the longer Congress has waited the more pertinacious seems to be the determination of the Executive to maintain the usurpation which established those governments. And now at this late period it has become the duty of Congress to assert its right and to do its duty in establishing some kind of government for this people.

For two years they have been in a state of anarchy; for two years the loyal people of those ten States have endured all the horrors of the worst anarchy of any country. Persecution, exile, murder have been the order of the day within all these Territories so far as loyal men were concerned, whether white or black, and more especially if they happened to be black. We have seen the best men, those who stood by the flag of the Union, driven from their homes and compelled to live on the cold charity of a cold North. We have seen their loyal men flitting about everywhere, through your cities, around your doors, melancholy, depressed, haggard, like the ghosts of the unburi dead on this side of the river Styx, and yet we have borne it with exemplary patience. We have been enjoying our "ease in our inns;" and while we were praising the rebel South and asking in piteous terms for mercy for that people, we have been deaf to the groans, the agony, the dying groans which have been borne to us by every southern breeze from dying and murdered victims.

And now we are told we must not hasten this matter. I am not for hastening it unduly; but I am for making one more effort to protect these loyal men, without regard to color, from the cruelties of anarchy, from persecutions by the malignant, from vengeance visited upon them on our account. If we fail to do it, and to do it effectually, we should be responsible to the civilized world for, I think, the grossest neglect of duty that ever a great nation was guilty of before to humanity.

Now, sir, with these few remarks I will say one word as to what the bill is. Then, in compliance with my determination, I will yield the floor to such gentlemen who may wish to occupy it.

This bill provides the ten disorganized States shall be divided into five military districts, and that the commander of the Army shall take charge of them through his lieutenants as governors, or you may call them commanders if you choose, not below the grade of brigadiers, who shall have the general supervision of the peace, quiet, and the protection of the people, loyal and disloyal, who reside within those precincts; and that to do so he may use, as the law of nations would authorize him to do, the legal tribunals wherever he may deem them competent; but they are to be considered of no validity per se, of no intrinsic force, no force in consequence of their origin, the question being wholly within the power of the conqueror, and to remain until that conqueror shall permanently supply their place with something else. I will say in brief that is the whole bill. It does not need much examination. One night's rest after its reading is enough to digest it.

Still, as there must be, and ought to be, on these matters full discussion, so that the people, the sovereign people of the United States, may hear and read and be able to decide upon the questions, we propose that in addition to the three weeks (I think it was) already spent in the discussion of reconstruction, a day or two of the short remnant of the session may be devoted to debate. I may remark that we have now perhaps less than fifteen days this side of a veto in which this bill must pass this House and pass the Senate and be acted upon, if it is to become a law. We are, therefore, not at liberty to indulge our friends on the other side—which I would very much like to do, for I would like to hear each one of them make a speech on this subject—we are not at liberty to indulge them by adjourning the action beyond the time of which I have given notice. Upon counting the days which we have left to act, I do not see that it will be possible for us to pass this bill with any hope of its becoming a law under all the circumstances if longer time is given.

Now, sir, I have said that I should not occupy much time. I hoped that gentlemen might be limited to twenty minutes, so that more of them could speak. I still hope that will be done, and I again suggest, before I sit down, that that proposition be accepted.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman consent to let the debate go on to-day and to-morrow, and take the vote on Monday?

Mr. STEVENS. I have already, I think, three times refused that proposition.

Mr. ROGERS. I understand he intends to bring it to a vote to-morrow.

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROGERS. Say Saturday.

Mr. STEVENS. I have already said that to-morrow, God willing, I will demand the vote. I now yield fifteen minutes of the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. BRANDEGEE.]

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. Speaker, I shall give my support to the bill now before the House, reported by the select Committee on Reconstruction, with all my heart.

Of all the various plans which have been discussed in this Hall for the past two years to my mind it seems the plainest, the most appropriate, the freest from constitutional objection, and the best calculated to accomplish those two master aims of reconstruction.

1. The garnering up of the fruits of our victories.

2. The restoration of peace and union upon the only stable basis upon which peace and union can be restored; liberty to all, rights for all, and protection to all.

It begins the work of reconstruction at the right end, and employs the right tools for its accomplishment. It begins at the point where Grant left off the work, at Appomattox Court-House, and it holds those revolted communities in the grasp of war until the rebellion shall have laid down its spirit, as two years ago it formally laid down its arms.

This bill is founded upon the indisputable law of nations as affirmed by every publicist from Vattel to Halleck, ancient or modern, and denied by none whose word is an authority—

"That the victorious belligerent may and should hold the vanquished belligerent in the grasp of war until he shall have secured all the issues which have been involved in the contest, obtained absolute protection to the allies who have aided him, and such added guarantees as shall forever secure him against the renewal of the contest."

Founded upon these principles which have passed into the axioms of national jurisprudence, the bill is justified by the fact—to which I challenge contradiction—that thus far not one single issue of the late colossal contest has been settled, not a solitary irrevocable guarantee has been obtained, and no protection other than a mere mockery and insult secured to those allies to whom, in the depth of your distress, you cried out in agony for assistance and succor.

Mr. Speaker, two years now in the coming month of April have elapsed since the great rebellion formally laid down its arms. What have you thus far obtained for the three hundred and fifty thousand of your first born who sleep in bloody shrouds in these cold blasts of the coming spring? What for the $4,000,000,000 of debt, for the payment of which you are compelled to rob the earth, the air, and the sea? What one traitor has been punished for his crime of crimes? Where upon this broad continent has treason been made odious? What protection is there to-day to loyalty, black or white, from the Potomac to the Rio Grande? What indemnity have you for the past? What security even for the future? What guarantee against a new rebellion?

A new rebellion! Why, Mr. Speaker, the old rebellion has not yet been suppressed; it still lives; it dominates in every one of these reconstructed States; it has made loyalty odious and treason respectable by forcing traitors into the gubernatorial chairs of ten of the eleven of these revolted communities; in ten out of eleven it has sent traitors who audaciously demand seats upon this floor; it has clothed treason with the ermine on the bench of the ten revolted States; it has filled their halls of local legislation; it has armed treason with the sword of the law in ten of the States; it holds to-day the pen of the press, that weapon mightier than the sword; it desecrates the word of the Most High from all their pulpits; it hisses out curses against the Union from the sibilant tongues of its women and the prattling lisp of its babes; it proscribes and hunts to their deaths that noble army of martyrs, the Union men of the South; and it scouts and throws back in your teeth the mild and merciful terms of reconstruction offered in the constitutional amendments of last session. It no longer creeps upon the ground as in the hundred days which followed Sherman's marvelous march to the sea, or the awful thundering of Grant's cannon in front of Richmond; but it stands erect, defiant, and audacious, demanding as a right to accomplish by legislation what it failed to achieve by the sword; and, countenanced by a weak, if not a wicked, Executive, and sustained by its copper supports at the North, it erects its brazen brow to the sunlight and beats at the doors of the Capitol—

"Parca meto, primo, mox sese attollit in auras, Ingreditur que solo, et caput inter nubila condit."

Mr. Speaker, something must be done. We must do it. The American people demand that we shall do something and quickly. Already fifteen hundred Union men have been massacred in cold blood—more than the entire population of some of the towns in my district—whose only crime has been loyalty to your flag, and in the single State of Texas alone, in all the revolted States, upon the testimony of your ablest generals, there is no safety to the property or lives of loyal men. Is this what the loyal North has been fighting for? Thousands of loyal white men driven like partridges over the mountain, homeless, houseless, penniless to-day through this capital. They fill the hotels, they crowd the avenue, they gather in these tessellated and marble corridors, they look down from these galleries and with supplicating eyes they ask protection from the flag which floats above the Speaker's chair; a flag which to them has thus far unfurled its stripes, but concealed the promise of its stars.

For myself, may my right hand forget her cunning and my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth if I desert them. We must stand by them; we owe it to them, to ourselves, to our martyred dead, to the God of nations and of justice. This bill alone can preserve them; other schemes of civil reconstruction can come by and by. The duty of to-day and now, of this hour, is to stand by the men who stood by the flag, the noble Union men of the South, black and white. For one I mean to do it to the end of the chapter. Believing this bill justified by the undoubted law of nations, demanded by the necessities of the hour, recommended by all the highest military authorities, and necessary to the preservation of the true men of the South, I give it, Mr. Speaker, my cordial support. I see no other way out of our difficulties; and while I am ready to extend the olive branch of peace when it can be received in the spirit of peace, I now vote to unsheath the great sword of the Republic and place it in the hands of the greatest captain of the age, that he may demand once more, in the name of the God of justice, the "unconditional surrender of the rebellion."

Mr. LE BLOND. Mr. Speaker, Ohio has no nominating convention to come off on next Wednesday, as the gentleman [Mr. BRANDAGEE] has who has just taken his seat. Therefore, even though otherwise I might be so disposed, I shall not indulge in any high-sounding declamation; but simply present my views in a brief form, disconnected as they must be, in reference to this bill.

Sir, the bill was presented here at the close of the session yesterday; it has been printed and laid on our tables at noon to-day; and now the decree has gone forth from the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] that to-morrow at one o'clock we are by a solemn act to declare that all the results of the late war are for naught and that this Union is dismembered, forever dissolved. I feel, sir, that the passage of this bill is the death-knell of civil liberty, not only here but everywhere. Sad as the thought may be it is too true that almost the last hope of a once free people, that liberty is secure here, is fast passing away.

The bill under consideration proposes to establish nothing more and nothing less than a military despotism. That is not only the tendency but the probable object of much of our legislation.

What does the bill provide? The preamble declares:

Whereas the pretended State governments of the late so-called confederate States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana, Florida, Texas, and Arkansas were set up without the authority of Congress and without the sanction of the people; and whereas said pretended governments afford no adequate protection for life or property, but countenance and encourage lawlessness and crime; and whereas it is necessary that peace and good order should be enforced in said so-called States until loyal and republican State governments can be legally established: Therefore.

Sir, that rests, I suppose, upon the theory of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the power of this Government rests in the people, and that the Congress of the United States is the people, and therefore the Congress of the United States is all-powerful and can establish any form of government that it may deem proper though the Constitution expressly prohibits it. It is upon the theory of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. RAYMOND,] who edified not only this House but the American people a short time ago by the exhibition of a new constitution, a new fundamental law for this Government, a law fixed in the imagination of men alone. This is the law which he claims is higher than the written Constitution of the United States. Well, sir, this doctrine of a "higher law" is no new doctrine in this country. This doctrine is the root and foundation of all our troubles and is indirectly the cause of all the expenditure of treasure and blood to which we have been subjected.

The preamble of this bill does not embrace a single truth. Let us look for a moment at the status of these States, their relation to the Federal Government. And here permit me to say I differ with some gentlemen on this side of the House, as well as gentlemen on the other side. I maintain now, as I have ever maintained, that the State organizations of those States lately in rebellion never were broken up from the foundation of their State governments to the present time. All the "acts and declarations" of those who were engaged in the rebellion never destroyed a single State government. Their local governments were kept up during the rebellion. The executive, legislative, and judicial functions of each State continued in full operation during that period.

According to my recollection, not a single State changed her constitution during the rebellion; and the only change made since the close of the war is the one making their respective organic acts conform to the constitutional amendment submitted by Congress.

But suppose, sir, amendments had been made according to the rules prescribed by their constitutions, if the amendments were not in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, would be good and binding upon the people. The amendment would be just as binding as if made in time of peace.

No one, I apprehend, will contend that the adjudication of a claim between individuals during the rebellion and while the State was acting under the confederate government is void. To do so would make confusion worse confounded.

Sir, their State organizations were not broken up; their relations to the United States were only suspended. To assert, as the preamble does, that they have no real governments is to admit that the declaration of secession did carry them out of the Union and destroy their State governments. It is an admission of the right of secession, either reserved by the States or expressed in the Constitution. It is an admission but few believe and a less number willing to admit. It has been repeatedly affirmed upon this floor and by all parties that a State once in the Union always in except she dissolves her relations by successful war.

Then, sir, I maintain that these States are States within the Union; that they have never been out of the Union; neither have they overthrown their State governments. When the war ceased they took their position in the Union which they occupied before they rebelled, with all their rights as States, leaving the citizens subject to the laws, punishing them for violations.

This, sir, is no new idea. Let me say here in this connection that Lieutenant General W. T. Sherman has exhibited more statesmanship and a better appreciation of our form of government than the majority of this Congress. He comprehended the whole subject in the articles of capitulation with the confederate General Johnston. He enunciated the true doctrine, and if it had been followed by the President and Congress we would to-day have peace and harmony. There would be no necessity for enabling acts or revolutionary schemes such as we now have under consideration. Peace, happiness, and prosperity would pervade all parts of this Union. It was all that was required, all that could be demanded under the Constitution and laws, all that was necessary to produce not only a unity of States but a unity of hearts.

But we are told by gentlemen here, whenever they rise for the purpose of speaking upon almost any subject, that the President of the United States is guilty of usurpation; that the President of the United States has exercised unwarrantable jurisdiction in the appointment of provisional governors for these southern States. Sir, I agree that that was wrong. I am not here for the purpose of vindicating the President of the United States in the exercise of a power which I believe he did not possess. I do not think he ever had that power; and I think it was a grave error on his part to exercise the power of appointing those provisional governors.

In exercising that power, however, he was only carrying out to some extent the plan adopted by his predecessor in appointing provisional governors. I say the President had no power to do it; but I am not prepared to say, and will not say, that the President did not act in good faith, and with the conviction that it was the best thing to be done, and that under existing circumstances it was necessary. I do not for one moment believe that he acted criminally or with corrupt motives; but that he acted with the very best motives possible, looking to the final restoration of the whole Union. But, sir, I nevertheless believe it to have been a grave error.

But, here sir, is the rock upon which we split. If these States were not out of the Union, and if they kept up their State organizations till the close of the war, then, sir, neither the President nor Congress had any power to interfere with them. The officers in position were placed there by the people, and none but the people who placed them there could remove them, and that only in pursuance of law. Again I affirm that their State governments were not broken up. Their Representatives should have been received upon this floor unless they were excluded by reason of some prohibition prescribed in the Constitution or laws of the United States.

But, sir, to the bill. The last provision of the preamble says:

And whereas said pretended governments afford no adequate protection for life or property, but countenance and encourage lawlessness and crime.

Now, sir, who could expect that perfect peace would prevail throughout those States as soon as the war ended? It was in the nature of things there would be lawless conduct on the part of many citizens. That certain gentlemen desire difficulties to exist in the South in order that they may base legislation upon it, in order to carry out certain designs, I have no doubt. But that there is and has been less disturbance than could be expected under the circumstances is true. The civil authorities there have been using the power they have to keep down this lawlessness and to punish men for the commission of offenses. And if this Congress would only give them full power to exercise all of their functions we would have order and peace much sooner than by the plan now proposed to disturb and destroy their governments.

It must be remembered that four million slaves were set free who were before under the control of their masters. They knew no law except as it was given to them by their masters. Now they act for themselves, and too frequently act upon suggestions from the Freedmen's Bureau, with a view to furnish sensational articles that are so frequently read from the Clerk's desk.

The first section goes upon the supposition that they are not States. It divides these ten States into military departments.

The second section provides, not that the President of the United States, who is Commander-in-Chief of the Army and the Navy, and made so by the Constitution, should not appoint the military commandants, but that the general in command should take jurisdiction and appoint all these officers. I ask gentlemen what will you do with that provision in the Constitution which declares the President of the United States to be the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States?

This is almost a precise copy of the bill introduced in the Senate by Mr. WILLIAMS. In that bill it was provided that the President of the United States should make these appointments. He had some regard in that bill for the constitutional power of the President. He was willing to carry out that provision of the Constitution. But this Committee on Reconstruction—this maelstrom committee, which swallows up everything that is good and gives out everything that is evil—reports this bill taking away all of the power from the President of the United States, and confers that power upon the commanding general, in defiance of the express provision of the Constitution to which I have referred.

And although this second section strikes down that provision of the Constitution, yet the magnanimity of the chairman of that committee could not extend further than to allow us a few hours of debate on a proposition so important and so vital. He would not agree to fix a day when this bill should come up, so that gentlemen could collect their thoughts on the subject.

I suppose on the other side they have adopted the higher law doctrine, so ably discussed by the gentleman from New York, and need no reflection. That simple change, sir, if there were no other reason, ought to destroy this bill, ought to prevent its passage.

But that is not the worst provision in the bill. After appointing these military commanders in the several districts, giving them complete and exclusive jurisdiction in all civil and criminal matters, the third section contains a provision unparalleled in legislation, that these military commanders may confer power upon the civil tribunals of the State to try certain offenses; that is, may confer upon a judge elected by the people or appointed by the President of the United States power to try a case of indebtedness between A and B if they think proper. Whoever heard of such a monstrosity as this? Whoever heard of such a stretch of power on the part of Congress? The Constitution provides that—

"In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense."

Instead of permitting the party to be tried by a jury selected within the district, to be tried by a judge appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, or a judge elected by the people, before he can be tried before a tribunal thus raised it is required he shall go before this military commander and ask him whether he will grant his permission. You deny him the right of jury. You deny that the accused shall be confronted with witnesses as the Constitution guarantees. This military commander is to call around him a court-martial, and call the person there for trial, with no power to employ an attorney to defend him.

This, sir, is the legislation you propose; this is the proposition you submit for the reconstruction of your disorganized States, as you term them. Sir, it is a blow at the very principles of civil liberty; it is striking down the right of trial by jury; it is establishing military tribunals to try cases in contravention of the provisions of the Constitution of the United States. Now, sir, I appeal to gentlemen to pause before they run into this kind of legislation, to look at the consequences, to reflect upon what is to be the final result upon this legislation.

Not content with doing all this, not content with denying to these people the right of trial by jury and of being represented by counsel, you propose to tie up the hands of the civil courts in all these States, and say they shall not issue a writ of habeas corpus where a party has a meritorious case unless he first gets the consent of your military tribunals. You thus strip a man of all possible remedy of redress; you deny to him the courts that have been created by yourself and in full operation.

I have thus briefly alluded to the provisions of this bill. I have said more than I intended to say when I rose. The time given for the examination of this bill is so limited that no man can, on the brief examination allowed, present his views as he would desire. But, sir, there is enough to be seen upon a mere glance at the bill to lead every man who is not actuated by political or party considerations to go against it and save the Constitution of his country.

The provisions of this bill strike down every important provision in your Constitution. You have already inaugurated enough here to destroy any Government that was ever founded. You have already prepared your articles of impeachment. The decree, I believe, has gone forth, and the impeachment must and will take place. If you have not yet issued the decree in formal caucus, you have caucused enough among yourselves to know what the result is to be. And yet the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary refuses to give us any light on the question.

Now, sir, you impeach the President of the United States, paralyze the arm of the Supreme Court, and of the judiciary generally. You have been, and are now, declaring to yourselves that this Congress is all-powerful as the representative of the people. What have you left to the American people to vindicate their rights? You have left nothing to them but quiet submission to your usurpation of power; for it is nothing but usurpation on the part of Congress to take these powers upon itself in contravention of the Constitution. When you do that there is nothing left, I repeat, but quiet submission to your tyranny, or a resort to arms on the part of the American people to defend themselves.

Now, sir, I do not predict anything. I do not desire war; but as one American citizen I do prefer war to cowardly submission and total destruction of the fundamental principles of our Government. Sir, the unity of these States was attempted to be destroyed by war and failed; it is now sought to be destroyed by legislative usurpation; and in my honest conviction nothing but the strong arm of the American people, wielded upon the bloody battle-field, will ever restore civil liberty to the American people again. We are drifting to monarchy. It will come unless the people take this matter in hand and stop this progress that is being made in that downward road, and restore this shattered Government upon the basis upon which it was originally founded.

I yield the remainder of my time to my colleague, [Mr. FINCK.]

Mr. FINCK. Mr. Speaker, I approach the examination of this measure with a saddened heart. I know of none which has been presented to the American people of so grave a character and magnitude as the questions involved in the bill now presented by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania. I have been taught to revere the Constitution of my country and to love the Union of these States. I have been taught to believe that ours was a Government of law, in which the rights of the American people were protected by the Constitution of the Federal and State Governments. But, sir, I see an attempt in the passage of this measure to overthrow free government, and to establish on its ruins the principles of military despotism. I had hoped that the great issues before the American people would have been adjusted in the spirit of wisdom and moderation, and that all the States once more would be assembled here by their representatives, in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution, and again move along harmoniously in the legitimate legislation of the American people. In the presence of this measure I tremble at the thought that our hopes may perhaps be forever dissipated.

Certainly no member on this floor who understands the Constitution of the United States, and who is a friend of free government, will pretend to urge that we have any constitutional power to pass this bill. I understand the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] does not argue that there is any authority under the Constitution of the United States to sanction this measure; where, I ask, does he obtain the authority to pass it? On what principle is this Congress and the people of the United States called upon to adopt it?

If I understood the gentleman correctly, he claims the power to pass this bill under the law of nations and upon the doctrine of the right of the conquerors to take possession of and control conquered territory and its inhabitants in such a manner as may suit the purposes of the conqueror. This is the ground upon which the measure is defended. Certainly no man will insult the intelligence of the American people by defending it upon any other principle. It is at war with the Constitution; it is at war with every principle of free government. And I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it cannot be successfully defended on the ground upon which it is placed by the chairman of the committee.

He places it upon the ground that we, as conquerors, have a right to dictate to the people of these ten States their governments and by the strong arm of military power hold and treat them as a conquered people. I deny most emphatically both the premises and conclusions of the learned gentleman.

I can understand very well how when two distinct and foreign nations are engaged in war, the result of that war may be a conquest of the territory and of the inhabitants of one of the belligerents. That result has been achieved more than once in the history of the nations of the earth. But, sir, that condition of things could not result from the late war for the suppression of the rebellion. What was that war, Mr. Speaker? It was not a war between distinct and separate nations. It was a war upon the part of the Federal Government, to do what? Not to make a conquest of territory. Not a war for subjugation. No, sir; it was a war on the part of the Federal Government to enforce its laws throughout the jurisdiction of the United States. It was a war on the part of the Federal Government to remove all armed opposition to the execution of the laws and maintain the supremacy of the Government; to preserve the union of these States and to suppress all opposition to the just and rightful execution of the laws of the United States.

Need I say that in such a war as that, confined within the limits of the Republic, there could not be any conquest of territory or the people of any State belonging to the Union? I put the question to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS:] what did you conquer? You conquered a peace; but did you conquer a single inch of territory over which the United States did not exercise jurisdiction before the war commenced? Not a single inch, sir. Neither did you acquire by the results of the war jurisdiction over a single man, woman, or child over whom you would not have had jurisdiction if the war had not taken place? No, sir; you merely reestablished firmly the jurisdiction of the United States, not over any new territory, not over territory conquered from a foreign enemy, but we reestablished the jurisdiction of the United States over what had been and what continued to be during the war; a part of the territory comprised within the boundaries of the United States. We are not to-day exercising jurisdiction over these ten States rightfully by the laws of nations, and can only exercise over them the jurisdiction and authority which was authorized before the war commenced, and which is regulated by the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, the only ground upon which the gentleman can possibly defend his bill is the ground which does not exist in the condition of our affairs. Is it possible, sir, that any gentleman will argue that the Federal Government could have made a conquest of its own territory? Such a result would have been impossible. I ask gentlemen upon the other side who sustain this bill to cite a single instance in the history of nations where a nation has made conquest of its own territory or its own people. There is no such instance in history. Nations have suppressed revolts within their own limits; nations have suppressed rebellions against their Governments; nations have maintained by war the integrity of their own territory; but never has any nation in suppressing a revolt of its citizens against its Government acquired title to its own territory by conquest or the rights of the conqueror over its own people.

The idea of defending this revolutionary scheme on the pretext that this Government is authorized to exercise toward the territory and people of these ten States the rights under the laws of nations of a conqueror and thus overthrow the Government, is one only to be conceived by the fertile genius of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] What is the territory of these States? Who are the people of these States who you now propose to put under this military despotism? Four of those States which are to be put under this military government, are four of the original thirteen States which formed your Constitution, and which is now to be subverted to enslave them. The people of those States who are to be subjected to this worse than despotism, are the sons and the daughters of the men who with your fathers and mine fought together in the revolutionary struggle, and by their patriotic devotion and their wisdom aided to achieve our independence and establish this free system of Government. Sir, I know these people have committed a great wrong in trying to break up this Union. I have always opposed their attempt to withdraw from the Union. I have always denounced secession. But, sir, they failed in their mad attempt to overthrow the Union of these States, and have they not suffered, Mr. Speaker, as no people have ever suffered before? I believe they are now sincere in their desire to continue in the Union and to share the blessings and burdens of a common Government with us. Sir, if we wish a real Union we must treat them as friends and not as enemies; we must have confidence in them; and as we and our children for generations to come are to live with them and their descendants, I submit, sir, that it is best for all of us and for the peace and prosperity of this great country, that we should live together as friends.

But such is not the policy of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Can it be possible, Mr. Speaker, that we have gone back six centuries in the history of the world, and are willing to strike down the great principles of free government for which so many struggles and heroic sacrifices have been made by our ancestors? Is it possible that in this Congress we can find men bold enough and bad enough to conspire against the great right of trial by jury; the great privilege of habeas corpus; men who are willing to reverse the axiom that the military should be subordinate to the civil power, and to establish the abhorred doctrine resisted by the brave and free men of every age, that the military should be superior to the civil authority? Who would have believed that the sons of revolutionary fathers, bred under the influences and teachings of our system of free government, would to-day in an American Congress gravely discuss the question whether ten millions of their fellow-citizens should be placed under a military despotism?

Mr. Speaker, I speak earnestly upon this subject, but not more earnestly than I feel. I look upon this measure as a most dangerous and alarming proposition. Not only in the provisions of this bill to which my friend and colleague [Mr. LE BLOD] has referred, striking down the great rights of the American system of Government do I find most serious cause for objection, but also in the additional proposition that no judicial or legislative interference shall take place in reference to military commissions and military trials authorized under this bill. Let me read that portion of the bill. I refer to the latter clause of the third section:

And all legislative or judicial proceedings, or processes to prevent or control the proceedings of said military tribunals, and all interference by said pretended State governments with the exercise of military authority under this act shall be void and of no effect.

Can it be possible that the measure now before us, was deliberately prepared by any gentleman upon this floor? Is it possible that this measure has been seriously considered? Do gentlemen believe they have the least shadow of authority to thus attempt to close the doors of the judicial department of this Government, so that the Supreme Court of the United States cannot examine into a sentence or order made by one of these petty military tribunals which are to be set up over the lives, liberty, and property of the people of ten of these States? Are we slaves? Are the American people so engaged in the struggle for "the almighty dollar" that they have forgotten the sacred rights of a free people and decline the task to maintain a free Government? Is it possible that these military tribunals and commissions shall override your Constitution, and that an American Congress can be found who will say that their orders and decrees are not to be interfered with by the supreme judicial tribunal of the United States? If so, then all we have to do is to withdraw all our protestations in favor of free Government, and declare that we will quietly and ignominiously submit to the surrender of the priceless blessings of that system of government which has been transmitted to us by an illustrious ancestry.

Gentlemen well know that the Supreme Court of the United States has solemnly declared in the Milligan case, by a unanimous decision on the main point in the controversy, that there was no authority in these military tribunals either to try, convict, or punish any citizen who was not in the military or naval service of the United States. But in this bill, in opposition to that decision of the supreme judicial tribunal of the country, it is not only proposed that none of the orders or decisions which may be made by these military commissions shall be revised by the President of the United States, who is the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy; but more than this, that these orders, findings, and decisions shall not be reviewed or interfered with by the judicial tribunals of the country.

And, sir, is this the end of the war? Is this, then, to be the result of the sacrifice of the lives of so many thousands of our people and the expenditure of countless millions of treasure, that now, when the war has terminated, when peace reigns throughout the borders of the Republic, the Representatives of two thirds of the States shall gravely determine to put the people of the remaining ten States under a military despotism? Is this the free Government of which we so much boast? Are these the doctrines that were taught us by the men who established our system of government?

Sir, I declare it as my solemn conviction that no Government can long continue to be free where one third of its people and one third of its States are controlled by military power. You cannot, Mr. Speaker, hold one third of the people of this Union under military power, and at the same time preserve the freedom of the people of the other States. It is impossible.

I object, therefore, to this bill on the broad ground that it is a blow aimed at the overthrow of our system of government. I do not believe (and in this I mean no disrespect to any gentleman on this floor) that the men who support this bill, whatever may be the purity of their intentions, are the friends of the Union or of free government. I do not believe that the men who desire to impose this measure upon these States are willing that this Government shall be controlled and administered in accordance with the Constitution of our fathers. I believe, on the contrary, that it is an attempt to maintain party ascendancy by excluding from all voice in the Government, a large portion of the voters of this nation.

Have we, Mr. Speaker, forgotten the sermon of our divine Redeemer on the Mount? Are we to act as men who have no love or charity in their hearts? Are hatred, malice, and revenge to usurp the holy functions of Christian charity? Do we intend to perpetuate the Union of these States by the principles of hate? Do we expect to make the people of the South love the Union by trampling upon rights as sacred to them as they can be to us? Do we expect to perpetuate the principles of free government by blotting them out entirely in one third of the Republic? Is revenge to be perpetual? I trust not, Mr. Speaker. I trust, sir, we shall not enter upon any such unfortunate experiment as is proposed by this bill; and I pray the Almighty Ruler of nations that He may inspire the American people with such wisdom that they may understand the grave responsibilities of the hour; that they may be aroused to realize, and to realize at once, the volcano upon which we are standing; that they may appreciate the fact that their system of government is threatened, and that if they venerate the character of their revolutionary sires, if they love and cherish the institutions which have been transmitted to them by those patriotic ancestors, if they would perpetuate their republican form of government, they must remember that eternal vigilance is the price of liberty. Let us rise equal to the great occasion, and animated by no paltry considerations of mere party or sectional animosities, let us, I beseech you, Mr. Speaker, abandon these dangerous experiments and unwarranted usurpations of power, and labor with a patriotic devotion to unite again all these States and the people of all these States in the strong and enduring bonds of mutual friendship and interest, and together go forward in the achievement of that grand destiny which most certainly awaits this country as a united people, if we are but true to the Union of these States and the great principles of our Constitution.

Mr. PIKE, Mr. FARNSWORTH, and Mr. ROGERS addressed the House. [Their remarks will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. BINGHAM. It was not my purpose to undertake any discussion of this important bill, and I only rise for the purpose of suggesting in a very few words to gentlemen of the House the importance of making haste slowly in the exercise of this highest possible power conferred by the Constitution upon the Congress of the United States. For myself, sir, I am not going to yield to the proposition of the chairman of the committee for a single moment that one rood of the territory within the lines of the ten States enumerated in this bill is conquered territory. The Government does not conquer any Territory that is under the jurisdiction of the Constitution.

THE SPEAKER. The Chair interrupts the gentleman to state that the recess will take place in a few moments, unless by order of the House the session be extended until the gentleman closes his remarks.

Mr. SPALDING. I object.

Mr. HILL. I move to extend the session till five o'clock.

Mr. BINGHAM. I wish to make this suggestion before I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the House adjourns will the gentleman not be entitled to the floor when we reassemble in the evening?

THE SPEAKER. He will.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to have my amendments printed. I will not submit to this gag; I know all about it.

Mr. HILL. If the gentleman will yield to me I will move to postpone the hour of taking recess to-day.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. HILL. I move that the time for taking a recess to-day be postponed until five o'clock p. m.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. SPALDING. I call for a division.

The question was again taken; and upon a division there were—ayes sixty-three.

THE SPEAKER. There is evidently a large majority in the affirmative.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I demand that those in the negative be counted.

The vote in the negative was taken; and there were—noes eighteen.

No quorum had voted.

The hour of half past four p. m. having arrived, the House, in pursuance of previous order, took a recess until half past seven p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House assembled at half past seven o'clock p. m., Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, Speaker pro tempore.

ARTHUR ORR ET AL.

Mr. HILL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of Arthur Orr, Bryant N. Lanham, and Samuel J. Smith; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

GOVERNMENT OF INSURRECTIONARY STATES.

The House then resumed the consideration of House bill No. 1143, to provide for the more effectual government of the insurrectionary States, upon which Mr. BINGHAM was entitled to the floor.

Mr. BINGHAM. It was not my purpose to have asked the attention of the House to any discussion of this bill; nor should I have done so if the motion to recommit had not been made, by which I was prevented from proposing amendments which I think ought to be considered by the House. I do not believe that in regard to a bill of this magnitude either a member of the committee or a member of this House is under any sort of obligation to take the bill as it comes from the committee without amendment or discussion. All that can be asked of any member is to give the bill a respectful consideration, and accept or reject it with or without amendment as his sense of duty may dictate.

As I said, in the few words which I uttered before the recess this afternoon, this bill is the exercise of the highest possible power of legislation which, under the Constitution of the United States, can be exercised by the representatives of the people. This being so, I believe the House should make haste slowly. I think, at all events, it should allow amendments to be offered; and when they are offered it should allow at least an opportunity for their consideration.

Now, my purpose is to make this bill, if it is to become a law, subject to as little objection as possible, without in any way impairing its efficiency. And I trust that before I shall have concluded the few remarks which I propose to make to-night I shall be able to persuade some of the Representatives here assembled that this bill may possibly be somewhat improved. At all events, I should consider myself false to my own sense of duty if I did not seek to amend this bill so that it would be in accord with the entire and continuous record of the great body of freemen represented upon this floor, who, under God, have enacted the laws through which and by which we have been saved as a nation. I challenge any man here to-night to point to any statute passed by the Congress of the United States, since the opening of this revolt on the part of the insurgent States to this hour, that by implication or otherwise, by direction or indirection, intimated the dogma of the chairman of the Committee of Reconstruction on the part of this House with which he opened this debate, that those ten insurrectionary States were a foreign and conquered country. I stand here to-night to assert that every act of legislation upon your statute-books, from the day this rebellion commenced to this hour, asserts the very contrary and excludes the conclusion of the gentleman.

How was it in 1861, when this conflict began, and you came to assess a direct tax and apportion it? You apportioned it among the citizens of the insurgent States as States; and you apportioned it among the people of the Territories as Territories. It is proposed to inaugurate a new theory, and to qualify, if not abrogate, your past legislation by incorporating in this bill, for the first time, the words the "so-called States." You did not insert in 1862, in your bill apportioning representation among the several States, the words, the several States except the "so-called States of Virginia," &c., shall be entitled to Representatives in Congress to the number of two hundred and forty-one. On the contrary, you did by that act provide for the whole number, to be apportioned among all the States; and accordingly the apportionment was made that South Carolina should be entitled to four Representatives, and the State of Georgia to seven, and so on. It is pretty well understood in this country that representation in Congress is only apportioned among States, and not among territories, whether acquired by purchase or conquest, nor among foreign States, but only among States within the Union. By this apportionment you did provide that all States within the Union, having constitutional State governments and sustaining practical constitutional relations to the Government of the United States, might elect Representatives in single districts. Surely, sir, if Virginia had resumed her constitutional relations in 1864 she would have been so entitled to elect Representatives to Congress. By the proclamation and message of our late lamented President this opinion was clearly and fully expressed by his words, "the resumption of the national authority within the States wherein that authority has been suspended." It did not occur to that statesman to say the so-called States of Mississippi, Alabama, North Carolina, and Georgia, &c., in which the national authority has been suspended. Clearly by proposing that upon laying down their arms and submitting to the laws and Constitution of the United States and taking the oath prescribed in his proclamation, and saying that if in any of the States named there shall, in the mode prescribed, be set up a State government, it shall be recognized and guaranteed by the United States. He recognized them as States in the Union without constitutional State governments.

By the Freedmen's Bureau bill of last session for the protection in the insurgent States of those who, by the action of the American people by a constitutional amendment, had been released from bondage, you do not find incorporated the words "so-called States." On the contrary, sir, in that statute the very words may be found which I seek to insert by way of amendment in the preamble to this bill.

In this connection I wish to incorporate in my remarks the fourteenth section of the act to continue in force, and to amend "An act to establish a Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees;" and which section is as follows:

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That in every State or district where the ordinary course of judicial proceedings has been interrupted by the rebellion, and until the same shall be fully restored, and in every State or district whose constitutional relations to the Government have been practically discontinued by the rebellion, and until such State shall have been restored in such relations, and shall be duly represented in the Congress of the United States, the right to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, and give evidence, to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property, and to have full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings concerning personal liberty, personal security, and the acquisition, enjoyment, and disposition of estate, real and personal, including the constitutional right to bear arms, shall be secured to and enjoyed by all the citizens of such State or district, without respect to race or color, or previous condition of slavery. And whenever, in either of said States or districts, the ordinary course of judicial proceedings has been interrupted by the rebellion, and until the same shall be fully restored, and until such State shall have been restored in its constitutional relations to the Government, and shall be duly represented in the Congress of the United States, the President shall, through the Commissioner and the officers of the bureau, and under such rules and regulations as the President, through the Secretary of War, shall prescribe, extend military protection and have military jurisdiction over all cases and questions concerning the free enjoyment of such immunities and rights, and no penalty or punishment for any violation of law shall be imposed or permitted because of race or color, or previous condition of slavery, other or greater than the penalty or punishment to which white persons may be liable by law for the like offense. But the jurisdiction conferred by this section upon the officers of the bureau shall not exist in any State where the ordinary course of judicial proceedings has not been interrupted by the rebellion, and shall cease in every State when the courts of the State and the United States are not disturbed in the peaceable course of justice, and after such State shall be fully restored in its constitutional relations to the Government, and shall be duly represented in the Congress of the United States.

No man can read that statute and not come to the conclusion that every Representative in this House and every Senator who voted for the enactment of that law has, under his oath, averred two things. First, that those insurgent States are States of the Union, and next, that their population are citizens. They are declared States and the people thereof declared citizens of such States in the section just read.

What are we told now by this bill, in the face of all our past legislation, so often repeated? We are told, sir, that it ought to have been written in this section just read, "in the so-called States," and citizens of "the so-called States." Citizens of the so-called States are entitled to what? To the rights of citizens of the United States? No, sir; but to such rights, in the language of the gentleman who reported this bill, as the conqueror sees fit to give them. I stand here, sir, to repudiate that dogmatical assumption. There never was a moment, thank God, since rebellion fired the first gun at Fort Sumter that a State of this Union was foreign ground; and therefore it results that those States are not a conquered country, and that the loyal people of those States are no more conquered subjects and vassals than you are, or any other Representative upon this floor. And yet all that is embraced in the words "so-called States," in the light of the interpretation put upon them by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Reconstruction, [Mr. STEVENS.] If the gentleman wishes us to insert these words let him give us some intelligible reason for it. I suppose the gentleman gave us the best reason that could be given when he said they were a conquered people, subject to be governed by the conqueror, and subject also to the usages of war in such cases.

I respectfully submit, sir, that any loyal citizen of the United States in South Carolina or Georgia or Louisiana or in any other of the southern States is no more liable to the rule of the conqueror after the armies of the rebellion have been disbanded than are the representatives of the people in this Hall. Why should they be? Men who never lifted up their hands in revolt against their Government and country; men who followed your flag in the hour of darkness and distrust; men who supported the shaking pillars of the Republic in the tempest of battle are not now to be told that they are captives of war, subject to the will of the conqueror. Sir, I repudiate the proposition, and without intending the slightest disrespect to any one, I will add that I repudiate it as unreasonable and unjust.

The rights of a citizen of the United States are in his own keeping; they are not to be forfeited by the crimes of others, whatever may be the dogmas of the continental writers, in which gentlemen are fond of indulging when they come to a discussion of this question. Is it not clear that under the Constitution and the laws of the United States no law-abiding citizen of this Republic can be deprived of his personal and civil rights by way of punishment on account of the crimes of others? Every man in every State of this Union is responsible only for his own crimes, and not for the crimes of others, in which he in nowise participated, and with whom he in nowise sympathizes. Surely it is not needful, even seemingly, to assert either in the preamble or body of this bill, that the insurrectionary States are foreign and conquered provinces, and the people thereof captives of war. It is because I entertain these views that I ask leave to move in this House that the preamble and bill may be amended. The preamble is as follows:

Whereas the pretended State governments of the late so-called confederate States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana, Florida, Texas, and Arkansas was set up without the authority of Congress and without the sanction of the people; and whereas said pretended governments afford no adequate protection for life or property, but countenance and encourage lawlessness and crime; and whereas it is necessary that peace and good order should be enforced in said so-called States until loyal and republican State governments can be legally established: Therefore, &c.

If permitted I would move to strike out this preamble for the reasons which I have already intimated to the House. I move to strike it out, because it is interpreted by the gentleman who reported this bill as being intended—although it is no part of this bill and has no operative effect—as a solemn declaration on the part of this House that those States are foreign conquered territories, and that the people of those States, all the people therein, are alien enemies, captives of war, and subject to the conqueror's will. I ask that leave to propose such amendment be conceded by the House, because the preamble is not needful, because it adds no force to the bill, and because it gives no protection to any citizen, and if passed is but a declaration. Surely, sir, it is not needful to make such recital as is made in this preamble in order to show authority in the Congress of the United States to pass such laws as may be necessary, as may be wise and just and proper for the protection of persons and of property throughout all the insurrectionary States.

I have myself no doubt that under the Constitution of the United States, without going outside of its plain written letter, the Congress of the United States have full and exclusive jurisdiction to pass and enforce all needful laws for the protection of the person and the property of every citizen in those insurgent States, until that good time comes when those States shall be duly reorganized and readmitted to representation in Congress.

That being so, where is the necessity of this preamble? What force does it give to this bill? How does it strengthen this great cause of ours to make this manifest and palpable departure from all our preceding legislation? That is the question I want answered in the progress of this debate. What is not needful to the efficiency of this bill no man here should insist upon, especially if it be offensive to those of us who are desirous to maintain the national authority and to protect the lives and liberty and property of all alike, under such rules and regulations as the law-making power of this nation may prescribe, until those States shall be fully restored to their proper constitutional relations.

With a view, then, to test the sense of the House on this subject, if the majority of this House, as I trust they will, will refuse to second the previous question and allow an amendment to be voted upon, and allow the question to go to the people, I will move to amend the preamble by striking out the first clause and to insert in its place the following:

Whereas it is necessary that peace and good order should be enforced in the several States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana, Florida, Texas, and Arkansas, lately in rebellion, until said States respectively shall be fully restored to their constitutional relations to the United States: Therefore, be it enacted, &c.

I ask the House to consider the recital as it stands in the very words of your Freedmen's Bureau bill, the fourteenth section of which I have just read; and if it were fit and proper so to designate the States then, on the 22d of last July, it is equally fit and proper so to designate them now. If it is not, I wish to know the reason why.

I would also suggest that this bill be amended in the third line of the first section by striking out the phrase "so-called," so it will read "the said States," and stand with the text of the same section declaring that Virginia shall constitute the first district; North Carolina and South Carolina the second district; Georgia, Alabama, and Florida the third district; Mississippi and Arkansas the fourth district; and Louisiana and Texas the fifth district. Why use the words "so-called State of Virginia," and thereby raise a doubt what are the boundaries of that territory? Why not use the words in the last clause of the first section as I have just read them, without limiting them by the terms "so-called"? Every gentleman knows you must, under this bill, recognize the boundaries of these States as originally fixed by the sovereignty of this Union; and that they stand as they were to this day. The territorial jurisdiction becomes a very important consideration, as my learned friend well knows, and the territorial jurisdiction of whatever tribunals you create, whether civil or military, must be ascertained precisely by law. Grave, difficult questions arise if this be not done. Hence it is I propose to strike out the terms "so-called" in the third section, and insert "said States."

And in the fourth section, Mr. Speaker, I propose to offer an amendment for the consideration of the House, and I think if gentlemen will give attention to it, if they will examine the authorities on the subject, they will come to the conclusion the amendment would give efficiency to the bill; at all events, will secure it against adverse decisions in the several courts of the United States whenever the same question may be raised within your borders; that is to insert in the third line of the fourth section, after the word "custody," so it will read:

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That courts and judicial officers of the United States shall not issue writs of habeas corpus in behalf of persons in military custody, except in cases in which the person is held to answer only for a crime or crimes exclusively within the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States within said military districts, and indictable therein, or unless some commissioned officer on duty in the district wherein the person is detained shall indorse upon said petition a statement, certifying, upon honor, that he has knowledge or information as to the cause and circumstances of the alleged detention, and that he believes the same to be wrongful; and further, that he believes that the indorsed petition is preferred in good faith and in furtherance of justice, and not to hinder or delay the punishment of crime. All persons put under military arrest by virtue of this act shall be tried without unnecessary delay, and no cruel or unusual punishment shall be inflicted.

I think, Mr. Speaker, if there is anything well settled by the judicial decisions of the United States it is this: that where by positive law of the United States a person is authorized to be taken into custody and held to answer for a crime which by the laws of the United States is not indictable nor punishable in the Federal courts, the writ of habeas corpus will not lie in said courts unless expressly provided for by statute. If there be a decision of the courts of the United States in conflict with that I have never heard of it, and I will be under great obligations to any gentleman of this House who will point it out.

Why, sir, that question has been ruled in manner and form as I have just stated, where it involved the dread issue of life and death, where the person was placed under arrest by the warrant of a commissioner appointed by authority of an act of Congress, where the person so arrested was committed by the order of the commissioner and by no other authority, to be handed over to answer for his life upon a charge of crime not committed within the jurisdiction of the United States nor indictable in any of the courts of the United States. Upon application for a writ of habeas corpus it was refused, exceptions were taken, the case was brought into the Supreme Court, where it was fully argued and considered, and the court, according to my recollection, without a dissenting voice, ruled that their jurisdiction, if any, in the premises was purely appellate; and inasmuch as it was expressly provided in the Constitution that the appellate jurisdiction of that court should be subject to such exceptions as the Congress of the United States might by law enact, and inasmuch as the Congress in the case had withheld from the court and refused to confer appellate jurisdiction in such a case, the writ was refused.

Such will be the effect of this bill if the House adopts it with the amendment. How will the question stand then? Why, that the writ shall only issue in the cases excepted by the express terms of the amendment. In the language of the proposed amendment the writ shall only issue in cases where the person is held only to answer for a crime committed within the military districts prescribed in the bill, and which crime is indictable in the courts of the United States by existing law.

Now, sir, every man here knows well that there are but few crimes of any sort committed within the organized or disorganized States of this Union that are cognizable and indictable in the courts of the United States. The general purpose of this bill meets my hearty approval. All I desire is to so shape this legislation as to add to its efficiency by removing any cause or seeming cause for conflict with the civil authorities of the United States, especially so as to allow cases that are indictable in the civil courts of the United States within said insurrectionary States to be tried in them. I would like to inquire of gentlemen who seem to smile at the statement that but few offenses committed within a State are indictable in the United States courts, where is the statute of the United States that ever allowed any man to be punished for murder of a private citizen within the jurisdiction of a State of the United States, North or South? There is no such statute. I would like to know when any court of the United States held any man to answer for crime save and except in those cases which were made expressly punishable by act of Congress in the courts of the United States. No common law crime as such without a statute expressly authorizing it is indictable in the courts of the United States. Therefore I say, for the burning of the property of a citizen, for the murder of a private citizen, for the robbery of a private citizen, or for any other crime whatever against the person or property of a private citizen, committed in any State of this Union, the party is not indictable now and never was indictable in any court of the United States.

The object of this bill, then, is, as explained by one of my colleagues on the committee, to furnish some protection against the destruction of property and of life where that protection is withheld or not adequately furnished by the existing organizations of the South. That being the object of the bill, this limitation which I propose to incorporate in the fourth section, instead of defeating the object, simply removes what might be ruled a very grave objection to the validity of the bill. I do not care how much stronger gentlemen may express the amendment if they see fit, so that it will clearly and by express enactment declare that no appellate jurisdiction shall be taken by any of the courts or judges of the United States on the application of any person held by military authority within these States, except only where held for a crime indictable in the courts of the United States within said States under the existing laws.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BINGHAM. I will.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I understand the gentleman to take the position that these are States in this Union, not conquered territories, and the people are not conquered subjects. I desire to know by what authority the gentleman entertaining that view would fasten upon these people a military government? And I would like to know further, what laws are to be administered in those States if this bill passed and became a law—whether it is the unlimited, undefined will of the conqueror that is to govern and control that people, or whether there are civil laws now in force which are to be administered by the military authority conferred by this bill?

Mr. BINGHAM. I will answer the gentleman, I hope, before I sit down, very fully. But I desire to place this amendment before the House, so that its legislation may be consistent with itself.

There is another reason why this amendment to this fourth section should be adopted; and in presenting it I trust the scope of my remarks will be an answer to what the gentleman has said. It is true, undoubtedly true, that these States remained disorganized States in the Union. It is also undoubtedly true that those who were the conquerors upon the field of battle reduced those in rebellion to subjection. It is also undoubtedly true that the Government of the United States by its own election extended to those insurgents the rights of belligerents; and it is also true that by their rebellion those insurgents failed to place themselves in a position to put those States out of the Union or in the condition of foreign territory, or beyond the jurisdiction of the United States. They fully succeeded by their rebellion in overturning their previously existing State governments; and that being the case, the gentleman will find an answer to his question in this: that it follows from the premises that the legislative power of the Government of the United States is exclusive within those States, and so will continue until the people thereof reorganize constitutional State governments, and the same shall be recognized by Congress.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to ask the gentleman a question for the purpose of information alone. I understand it to be the objection of my colleague [Mr. BINGHAM] that the courts of the United States shall not be permitted to issue writs of habeas corpus in cases punishable under the congressional enactment. Now, I ask if it would not have the same effect if the phraseology were so altered as to say that the courts and judicial officers of the said States shall not issue writs of habeas corpus?

Mr. BINGHAM. Not quite, in my opinion.

Mr. SPALDING. I would ask the gentleman if he supposes that the State courts have the same jurisdiction in these States that our courts have?

Mr. BINGHAM. They have not.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I hope the gentleman will not pass from the subject until he thinks he has answered my question. He has not yet done so.

Mr. BINGHAM. I do not propose to evade the gentleman's inquiry.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I hope he will give a fair answer to my question.

Mr. BINGHAM. I was proceeding with the answer when I was interrupted. This exception which I propose has relation only to the courts of the United States, and not to the courts of the States. But, sir, I was proceeding to say, those insurgent States, having by rebellion destroyed and disorganized their State governments, ceased to be represented or to be entitled to be represented from that day in the Congress of the United States, and in reference to that deprivation I was proceeding to tell the gentleman that which is written in the Constitution of the United States, and which no member upon the floor can gainsay.

Mr. NEWELL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. BINGHAM. I cannot yield.

Mr. WRIGHT. I would like to ask the gentleman if, in his opinion, the party to which he belongs has conformed to the Constitution?

Mr. BINGHAM. The whole nation has settled the question of the power of Congress to legislate over those insurgent States without their consent and against their consent. It must be so, or it follows that all the laws you have enacted during the last five years affecting those people are unconstitutional and void. This exclusive power being in Congress to legislate over the people of those disorganized States for the protection of persons and property, it follows that their temporary organizations are subject to such limitations and prohibitions as by law Congress may impose. This being so, this bill in its general provisions, touching those State governments, is justified if in the judgment of Congress the necessity for it exists. The power asserted in this bill is in perfect harmony with all the legislation of this Government since the breaking out of the rebellion over those States. It has been settled by the voice of the nation, as I before stated, that those States are subject under the limitations of the Constitution to such legislation as Congress may see fit to impose, and can exercise the functions of local government only by the sufferance of the nation.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me to make an inquiry?

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I understand that the gentleman from Ohio desires, by his amendment to the preamble, to declare that these "States," as they once were in the judgment of all, are now States. If he believes that they are now States, I ask him how he can reconcile it with his oath to support the Constitution if he does not accord to them all the rights of States under the Constitution, and to their citizens all the rights of citizens of the United States to the same extent that those rights are accorded to the people of his own State?

Mr. BINGHAM. I do not by the amendment say they are now States as they once were. I have said they are States disorganized. I ask the gentleman how he can reconcile with his oath the fact that he voted for the Freedmen's Bureau bill on the 22d of July last, which bill subjected every one of those States until they shall be restored to their constitutional relations to the provisions of that act, and to the enforcement of the law according to its provisions?

Mr. BOUTWELL. There is no distinct declaration in the Freedmen's Bureau bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman will pardon me. There is a distinct declaration.

Mr. BOUTWELL. In that act we recognize "States and districts" as subject to the act.

Mr. BINGHAM. I understand; and we recognize also States separately.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Geographical States.

Mr. BINGHAM. Well, "geographical States," but the very phrase which I use is used in that act, and no such terms as geographical or so-called States are used in that act.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I wish to call the gentleman's attention to the question which I put to him. I would like him to answer it.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am answering it, and I am not to be diverted from my answer. The Freedmen's Bureau bill provided—

"That in every State or district where the ordinary course of judicial proceedings has been interrupted by the rebellion, and until the same shall be fully restored, and in every State or district?"

Mr. BOUTWELL. "State or district."

Mr. BINGHAM.

"whose constitutional relations to the Government have been practically discontinued by the rebellion, and until such State—"

There is no "district" there.

"shall have been restored in such relations, and shall be duly represented in the Congress of the United States."

Every gentleman knows that the words "or district" were employed so as to give effect to that bill in States in which the relations of the Government were partially restored, but in which there were districts in which those relations were not restored. There is no difficulty in that question, and I want to know, while I am on this subject, whether the gentleman from Massachusetts has so much respect for his oath that he is going to say that Virginia, in which you have indicted Jeff. Davis for high treason, ceased to be a State by reason of his treason, so that under the provisions of the Constitution he can no longer be held to answer for his crime in that State. The Constitution provides for a—

"Trial by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law."

Virginia remains a State, though disorganized, in spite of Jeff. Davis's treason, and he can be tried and punished in that State for his treason; and this doctrine is in harmony with all our previous legislation.

"I understand exactly why this phrase so-called is inserted in the preamble of this bill now pending and in the bill itself. It gives no force or effect whatever to the bill." I have already anticipated and answered the gentleman's objection. No matter what declarations we may now make we have treated those States as States in all our legislation heretofore. When the gentleman from Massachusetts voted for the act apportioning Representatives among these States what became of his oath to support the Constitution, if, under the circumstances, they were not States.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I was not here at that time.

Mr. BINGHAM. Well, then, I put the inquiry to the gentleman who were here and who did vote for that act, and who now advocate this bill; and the gentleman [Mr. BOUTWELL] was here last session when we passed the Freedmen's Bureau, in which we called them States and legislated over them as States.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I hope the gentleman will not forget to answer my question. He told me he would do so.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman's question only involved the point whether those States can exercise the functions of a State or were subject to exclusive congressional legislation in the absence of a constitutional State government. I have been answering that question.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I put to the gentleman this further question: if this bill should be enacted into a law what laws would then be in force over those people?

Mr. BINGHAM. That question I propose to answer, and with this I shall close what I have to say.

I have before replied to the gentleman that those States, having entered into rebellion, the unlimited power for the common defense throughout their limits was exercisable by Congress by virtue of the very terms and intentment of the Constitution, and this power may be exercised by Congress until the time when those people return to their loyalty and fealty in such a manner as shall satisfy the people of the United States, duly organized and represented in Congress, of their fitness to be restored to their full constitutional relations.

If this is not law then it results that the moment you break the battalion of armed rebellion in the field of open conflict, that moment all the sovereignty that originally pertained to organized constitutional State governments immediately springs into being without the power of challenge on the part of the nation. I deny that such is the fact. It remains for those who have been in rebellion after they have surrendered upon the field of conflict to exercise their right of petition, being citizens of the United States, peaceably and quietly under the general operation of the Constitution, the general jurisdiction of which still extends over them, and present to the Congress of the United States a constitutional form of government, republican as required by the Constitution, and in all respects conformable to the laws of the United States, and thereby give some evidence of their disposition and fitness to return to that allegiance which they attempted to throw off by their treason, and which they always owed to the Government, and to be restored to the powers of organized States of the Union, which had protected them and theirs. When that day comes the Government by the sword ought to and must cease and determine, and the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States to govern therein must then also cease.

I desire to call the attention of the House to this proposition: that the effect of the amendment which I propose in the preamble is to make a solemn declaration to the country that this military authority is not to be exercised an hour after those States shall have been restored to their constitutional relations. What objection is there to this? I know that it is not necessary to do so; but is it not politic and wise to solemnly notify the world that you are going to exercise these extraordinary powers only so long as, in the word of the Constitution, it shall be necessary for the rightful enforcement of the Constitution and laws and the protection of life and property in the insurgent States? Incorporate this amendment in the preamble and thereby proclaim that this power is to be exercised only until those insurgent States shall have been fully restored to their constitutional relations to the Government of the United States. This being done every one will be under the protection of the civil law, and the occasion for military rule will happily have passed away, and those disorganized States be restored to their equal political power in the Union.

I desire to put this amendment into the preamble for the further reason that I wish thereby to notify in the most solemn form the men who constitute, perhaps, the majority of the people in those ten lately insurgent States, and who themselves were in open armed rebellion, that what they have to do, and all they have to do, in order to get rid of military rule and military government, is to present to the Congress of the United States a constitutional form of State government in accord with the letter and spirit of the Constitution and laws of the United States, together with a ratification of the pending constitutional amendment.

That being done, sir, this military rule ceases and determines. I am sure of this: that the American people will have rule, civil or military, in those insurgent States until they shall be fully restored to their constitutional relations. And in so far as they may be able under direction of law and the authority of law enacted by their Congress, they will protect all men in those States in life, liberty, and property until they can be fully protected under accepted constitutional State governments. When men in those States shall have fulfilled their obligations, and when the great people themselves shall have put, by their own rightful authority, into the fundamental law the sublime decree, the nation's will, that no State shall deny to any mortal man the equal protection of the laws—not of the laws of South Carolina alone, but of the laws national and State—and above all, sir, of that great law, the Constitution of our own country, which is the supreme law of the land from Georgia to Oregon and from Maine to Florida—then, sir, by assenting thereto those States may be restored at once. To that end, sir, I labor and for that I strive; and in order there may be no hinderance in the way, no unnecessary catch-words inserted to get rid of that great amendment, I ask that this phrase "so-called States" be stricken from the bill and preamble, and that this limitation upon the exercise of this great power of Government be inserted plainly, declaring that military rule shall cease upon restoration.

Mr. MAYNARD. The gentleman will allow me to call his attention to this particular point: what effect will this bill have, if passed, upon the existing organizations of State governments?

Mr. BINGHAM. I attempted to state; it has this effect: they exercise their functions, if this bill shall pass, by sufferance of the nation, and to the extent the commanders may permit. I do not suppose the bill was intended to prohibit those informal governments from enforcing justice in their courts, or from deciding upon simple contracts. I do not suppose it was intended by this bill to enforce a collection of debts through courts-martial or military commissions, or to grant administration therein, or to prescribe the law for the solemnization of marriage, or for the distribution of estates, but to enforce such laws as will insure the safety and liberty of all the people of all those States.

Mr. MAYNARD. If we pass this bill will it permit us, so far as these organizations are concerned, if they embarrass us hereafter, to set them aside and provide others?

Mr. BINGHAM. If we are not satisfied that those organizations are republican and just and equal and constitutional, we may require them to go further and do something else.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. In the present position of the bill under consideration an amendment I am aware is not in order. But I desire to submit for consideration some amendments, and if they shall be found practicable and desirable they can be offered if opportunity shall be given hereafter. I may remark the bill does not propose any plan of reorganizing State governments in the late rebel States. It emphatically asserts, what is not seriously denied anywhere now, that the existing State governments in ten of the rebel States were set up without authority and in violation of the Constitution, and are therefore of course illegal. It provides for the military protection of the people in these States. The experience of nearly two years, and the concurrent testimony of all who have the means of knowing, abundantly prove the necessity of this military protection.

Unless the loyal population of these States is to be left to the merciless rule of the rebels, who employ the color of authority they exercise under illegal but de facto State governments to oppress all who are loyal without furnishing them any protection against murder and all the wrongs that rebels can inflict on loyal men, we cannot, dare not refuse to pass this bill.

But this bill does not touch the question of reorganizing legal State governments. Such governments can be established in several modes, if Congress would ratify the existing State governments that would give them validity. But there are objections to this. It is always dangerous to approve what has been illegally done. These State governments are in the hands of rebels, and have signally failed to accomplish the purpose of all government—to protect life, liberty, and property; and beside they are not republican in form. Congress might pass an "enabling act" prescribing the mode of organizing State governments, authorizing the appointment of provisional governors, with a provisional or temporary government somewhat similar to a territorial government. The territorial laws enable the people to form State governments; but with the appointing power in the hands of such a President as Andrew Johnson, the provisional governors would all be men whose sympathies and powers would be exercised in the interest of rebels against loyal men, against a State government republican in form. We cannot trust the President. An enabling act is therefore not so practicable as it would be if the President himself adhered to the principles which he professed when he was elected.

The people may voluntarily organize a State government in the exercise of the right of petition, and they may ask Congress to approve and ratify such government. This was done in the case of West Virginia and of Tennessee. But until such voluntary governments can be formed there ought to be, if practicable, a civil government in some form, with the administration of justice as well as that military jurisdiction which the condition of the rebel States demands, and which on constitutional grounds is justified by that condition and by the state of war which yet exists in those States—not flagrant war, but nevertheless a state of war—the period recognized by courts as non flagrante, sed nondum cessante bello.

This bill does not authorize any form of civil government, provisional or otherwise. It does indeed provide that the military authorities "may allow civil tribunals to take jurisdiction of and to try offenders." This, of course, permits the exercise of the jurisdiction not only of the national courts, but of those of the local illegal State governments. I will not say it is a recognition of the rightfulness of that exercise of jurisdiction, but it is open to the objection that it may be construed into a recognition of the right to exercise it.

For myself, I am ready to set aside by law all these illegal governments. They have rejected all fair terms of reconstruction; they have rejected the constitutional amendments we have tendered them; they are engines of oppression against all loyal men; they are not republican in form or in practice. Let them not only be ignored as legal governments but set aside because they are illegal. And inasmuch as the force of circumstances will not permit us to pass "enabling acts" that would be faithfully carried into effect, we may properly confer upon the national courts already existing in the rebel States the power to exercise all necessary jurisdiction in all cases where judicial authority may be requisite. This jurisdiction can be conferred on existing national courts just as fully as it is conferred on courts created in the Territories. This will give to all the people the protection of a judiciary under national authority. This bill provides that each district shall have assigned to it an officer of the regular Army who might be called, but is not, a military or provisional governor. He will be the executive authority, just as Andrew Johnson was military governor of Tennessee when its military necessities required such an officer there.

With this military and judicial authority in operation the people can by voluntary action, as in the case of Tennessee, form a State government in each State and submit it to Congress for its ratification and approval. And such governments, when properly organized and in loyal hands, and like Tennessee, accepting the proper terms of reconstruction, can by the action of Congress be ratified, and the States restored to their proper, practical relations in the Union. The amendments I have to suggest will complete this bill, and give that civil jurisdiction which this bill does not. All this is authorized by the Constitution in that clause which makes it the duty of Congress to guaranty to every State a republican form of Government. Congress is the sole judge of the means necessary to accomplish this end. The ten unreconstructed rebel States have no lawful State governments, and it is the duty of Congress now to take the steps necessary to create new State governments.

And now, Mr. Speaker, with a view to have the consideration of the House on certain modifications and additions to the bill, I suggest the amendments I send to the Clerk's desk:

The Clerk read as follows:

In section one, line three, strike out the words "so-called States," and insert the words "the several districts of country which, prior to the rebellion, composed the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana,

Florida, Texas, Arkansas, and Virginia, (not including any part of the present State of West Virginia.) In section three, line six, after the word "allow," insert the words "the national."

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the district courts of the United States in their respective districts, and the judges thereof severally in the several districts of country which, prior to the rebellion, composed the several States of Virginia, (not including the new State of West Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana, Florida, Texas, and Arkansas, shall have power and jurisdiction by the rules, usages, and practice which prevail in said courts and with said judges, or that may be prescribed for that purpose, to hear and determine all causes, proceedings, and rights of action at law, in equity and otherwise, and all matters of probate and testamentary jurisdiction as fully as all such causes, proceedings, rights, and matters could have been heard and determined in the courts and by the judges exercising jurisdiction prior to the rebellion, under the State governments then and theretofore existing in said several districts of country, but subject to the laws of the United States so far as the same may not be locally inapplicable.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the laws which are, or may be, in force in the District of Columbia, defining and punishing crimes, offenses, and misdemeanors, so far as the same may not be locally inapplicable, shall be in force in the said several districts and the district courts of the United States, and the judges thereof, in their respective districts, shall have jurisdiction and authority, according to the practice and usages of said courts and judges, or such as may for that purpose be prescribed, to try and punish all persons hereafter guilty of any crime, offense, or misdemeanor, as defined by said laws.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That said courts and judges shall have power and authority to issue and enforce all process writs, and adopt such practice and proceedings as may be necessary or proper to exercise the powers and jurisdiction herein conferred on said courts and judges, and to prohibit and punish the exercise of any such jurisdiction or power by any person, tribunal, court, or jurisdiction claiming a right to exercise, or in fact exercising the functions of any judge, court, tribunal, or authority under any of the illegal and unauthorized governments assuming to be State governments in any of said districts. And it shall be the duty of the military authorities to enforce the process, judgments, sentences, proceedings, and authority of the courts of the United States in said districts.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That the district court of the United States may hold sessions at such times and places as said court or the judge thereof may from time to time determine, and as may be necessary for the administration of justice.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the military authorities herein authorized to protect the loyal citizens of any district of country heretofore embraced in any one of the States herein named in any and all voluntary meetings, conventions, and proceedings which they may peaceably hold or institute for the purpose of making a constitution and organizing a State government republican in form, to be submitted to Congress for ratification and approval, and to go into effect only when so ratified and approved.

Mr. HISE. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose, as a member of the committee which reported this bill, to get the floor, in order to enter my protest against its adoption. I prefer, however, with the leave of the House, to defer my remarks till to-morrow, when the consideration of this subject is resumed. If it shall be the understanding that I can have the floor in the morning, I will give way to others who may wish to speak to-night.

Mr. SPALDING, Mr. LYNCH, and others objected.

Mr. HISE. Then I will, of course, proceed.

Mr. SPALDING. I do not wish to interfere with any rights that may have been extended to the gentleman from Kentucky by the chairman of the Committee on Reconstruction, and if it was his understanding that he was to go on to-morrow I withdraw my objection.

Mr. LYNCH. I also withdraw my objection, as I understand it will not affect the length of the debate whether the gentleman goes on now or to-morrow.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I insist that the debate shall take its regular course, unless the gentleman is unwell and therefore appeals to the courtesy of the House for permission to postpone his remarks.

Mr. HISE. I will state that I am no further indisposed than that I am somewhat weary with the labors of the day, and on that account prefer to defer my remarks till to-morrow; but I will go on to-night if it is insisted upon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is the objection withdrawn?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It is not.

Mr. HISE addressed the House for one hour. [His speech will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. INGERSOLL obtained the floor.

Mr. LYNCH. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment, to enable me to offer an amendment which I desire to have printed.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. LYNCH. I offer the following amendment, and move that it be printed:

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That under the direction of the General of the Army all the loyal male inhabitants of said districts, respectively, fit for military duty, between the ages of sixteen and forty-five years, shall be organized into district militia, shall be armed and equipped at the expense of the United States, and shall be called out for discipline and drill not more than twelve days in each year; and shall be called out for service to preserve order and maintain peace and the authority of the United States in the several districts, at the discretion of the district commanders, subject to the order of the General of the Army, and for like service in any other district by his order. While on service, active or for discipline and drill, said militia, officers and enlisted men, shall have the same pay and allowances as the regular Army of the United States.

The motion was agreed to.

A PATENT CASE.

Mr. ECKLEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill granting jurisdiction to the Court of Claims in a case involving the rights of a patentee; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. ALLISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was so referred; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RECONSTRUCTION—AGAIN.

Mr. INGERSOLL resumed the floor, and addressed the House. [His remarks will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. SHANKLIN obtained the floor.

Mr. TRIMBLE. Will my colleague yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SHANKLIN. I will.

Mr. TRIMBLE. I desire to give notice that if opportunity offers I shall ask leave to move as an amendment to this bill what I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That under the provisions of this act no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on presentment or indictment of a grand jury. And in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed.

And then, on motion of Mr. TRIMBLE, (at ten o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPIERSON, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 276) directing the Secretary of War to furnish certain muster-rolls to the different States, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

QUARTERMASTER SERGEANT OF ENGINEERS.

Mr. WILSON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1127) to fix the pay of the quartermaster sergeant of the battalion of Engineers, to report it back and recommend its passage. I hope it will be acted on at once.

By unanimous consent the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that hereafter the pay and allowances of the quartermaster sergeant of the battalion of Engineers of the Army of the United States shall be the same as those allowed by law to the sergeant major of that battalion.

The bill was reported to the Senate and ordered to a third reading.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not know that I have any objection to this bill, but I certainly do not understand it. I suppose it is one of those leveling up bills by which salaries are constantly raised. Somebody connected with the Army has had his salary increased, because he was supposed to be a particularly faithful officer, and then comes in a bill that somebody else shall have the same pay that he is receiving. I only call the attention of the Senate to it as an illustration of the way in which salaries are frequently increased. Some deserving person who is a favorite with Congress is suggested and a bill is introduced increasing his pay, and it is passed out of personal regard. Then at the next session a bill comes in to equalize somebody with him.

Mr. WILSON. This is a simple proposition which comes from the House of Representatives to increase the pay of this quartermaster sergeant of the Engineer corps, who has large responsibilities, to the amount received by another officer of less responsibilities. It is a small matter at any rate, but I hope the Senate will pass the bill promptly. Although it is leveling up pay I think it is hardly equal to the leveling up proposition we had yesterday from the committee of which the honorable Senator from Illinois is chairman, which was to raise the salary of a judge of the United States in the little State of Delaware, who has little or nothing to do, from $2,000 up to $4,000, because the salary of some other judges ought to be raised. This judge had time to issue a habeas corpus to take the murderers of Union soldiers of Maine out of Fort Delaware. This is the case of an officer with large responsibilities. This bill came from the Military Committee of the House of Representatives, and it is to correct a mistake made in the Army bill of last year.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I did not hear all the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts in reference to the State of Delaware and the judge of the United States district court there; but I heard this expression fall from his lips: "the little petty judge in the little State of Delaware." Mr. President, from my infancy I have known this "little petty judge" in the State of Delaware; he had the confidence of my father and I bear his name; and I take occasion here to say, not only in reference to the allusion now made to that venerable man, but in reference to the flood-tide of abuse which has been hurled against him by the Radical press of the North, that there is no man within the limits of the United States of America who throughout life has maintained a more honorable fame than Willard Hall, of the State of Delaware, district judge of the United States. Appointed to that position by President Monroe before the Senator from Massachusetts was old enough to mingle in the counsels of men, he has lived until the frosts of age have whitened his head without stain and without reproach among his fellow-men. A Christian, if there be one within the limits of this entire country, who giveth charitable and religious objects every year he lives more than the amount of his salary, devoted heart and soul to every good word and work for the improvement of his fellow-men. Now when the grave is opening before him, he is assailed throughout the length and breadth of the United States because in fidelity to his oath of office and to the high trust committed to him he fearlessly stands the defender of the Constitution of this country and vindicates it in his high office.

Sir, that distinguished judge does not belong and has not for many years belonged to the political party with which I act. If advocacy of the war after it commenced, if support of the war after it commenced, constituted loyalty, he was among the most loyal. He wished to avert the calamity of war, but when the country was engaged in war he was one of those who wished that success might attend your standard.

I take occasion too, sir, to say, in reference to that judge, that among all the district judges of the United States there are none abler. When appointed district judge for that State he was at the very head of the bar of that State. It was a pecuniary loss, a sacrifice to him to accept the position. It matters not to him whether you increased his salary or not, but when you increase the salary of one judge you cannot justly discriminate as against another. And in reference to the "petty State of Delaware" or the "little State of Delaware," I do not presume the honorable Senator from Massachusetts meant any reflection. It is true, sir, that she is not extensive as far as her territories are concerned; but there is one thing that can be said, she was the first to adopt the Constitution under which we formerly lived, the Federal Constitution, and under no circumstances has she through any department of her government done aught at any time in violation of that Constitution or in opposition to the Union for which that Constitution was formed.

It cannot be said of her that she has ever advised resistance even to Federal law. It is no fault of hers if wild and maddened schemes for the perpetuation of a political party in power have plunged this country into horrid civil war. It is no fault of hers if your Federal Union is this day destroyed. She has advocated none of the wild, unconstitutional doctrines which arrayed brother against brother, State against State, and section against section; but throughout her whole history, observing with fidelity the bond of union into which she entered with other States, she has trespassed upon no rights of others, and only claimed that she should be respected in her own. And throughout all her history she has shown a devotion to the Constitution of the country and to the union of the States which had it been followed by Massachusetts and other States, would have saved us from the calamities under which we now suffer; and instead of every household being this day clothed in mourning, instead of almost every eye in this country having been bathed with tears, there would be nothing but joy, happiness, and prosperity everywhere.

Mr. TRUMBULL. When I was up before I stated briefly the objection to this mode of legislation of raising the salary of one person so as to correspond with that of another without stating in the law the exact amount of salary. I think I am correct in this objection. The Senator from Massachusetts, before he got through with his remarks, placed this bill upon the very ground on which I objected to it. He said that the person holding the office of quartermaster sergeant was a faithful officer. Is that the principle upon which salaries are to be fixed? It may be in the view of the Senator from Massachusetts, because he has undertaken to denounce a measure which fixes the salaries of the district judges of the United States, on the ground, forsooth, that some incumbent of the office of district judge somewhere is not a man according to his views. Are the salaries of the officers of this country to be fixed upon any such principle as that? You might as well undertake to discriminate in this body, to give one Senator one salary and another a different salary.

The Senator says this is a very simple proposition. What is it? It is a proposition to allow to the quartermaster sergeant in the battalion of Engineers the same pay allowed by law to the sergeant major of the battalion. How many Senators know what that is? I think this is an improper mode of legislation, and I have objected to such legislation on previous occasions.

Mr. WILSON. This is a bill passed by the House of Representatives to increase the pay of an officer from twenty-two to thirty-six dollars per month, on the recommendation of the chief Engineer, accompanied by a letter from the Secretary of War. To explain the matter more fully, I will read a portion of a letter from the head of the Engineer corps to the Secretary of War:

"I have the honor [says General Humphreys] to invite your attention to certain matters relating to the organization of the Engineer battalion, which, in my opinion, call for additional legislation; and to ask that they be brought to the favorable attention of Congress at its present session.

"1. The pay of the quartermaster sergeant of the battalion should be made the same as that of the sergeant major. As the laws now stand the sergeant major receives thirty-six dollars per month; a sergeant thirty-four dollars; a corporal twenty dollars; and the quartermaster sergeant, who is the second in rank among the non-commissioned officers of the battalion, only twenty-two dollars. His duties, involving the care of much engineer property in addition to that belonging to the quartermaster's department, are of an important and responsible character, and it is but just that his pay should be made to correspond, instead of being as it now is, twelve dollars per month less than the company sergeants, who rank below him. The present rate of pay is clearly our inadvertence, which Congress would no doubt promptly correct on its being brought to its notice.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Now, in my judgment we should have understood this bill better if it had provided that the salary of this officer should be increased from twenty-two to thirty-six dollars per month, which the Senator from Massachusetts says is the effect of it. It is not framed in that way, but provides that one officer shall have the pay and allowances now given to another officer.

Mr. WILSON. If the Senator had asked me what change was made in the law by this bill as it came to us from the House of Representatives I could very readily have told him. I did not draw the bill; it comes from the House in this shape. I had the letters of the Secretary of War and of the chief Engineer at my desk and could readily have answered any question in regard to it, and should have been glad to do so.

Mr. CONNESS. Time is very precious at this period of the session, and I hope it will not be wasted on this little matter. When a measure comes from one of the standing committees of this body it is always entitled to consideration. I am sure this bill need not occupy much time. I trust we shall have the vote upon it.

Mr. DAVIS. I think the exception taken by the Senator from Illinois to the insidious manner in which this bill is worded is very proper and very just. That, however, is a favorite mode in which legislation for the purpose of an increase of salaries is introduced into the two Houses of Congress. I think it ought to be so distinctly reprobated that it shall not be repeated for the future. It is insidious, and it does not inform explicitly the two Houses of the nature or extent of the increase of salary that is proposed. I think the just and the true mode of raising salaries is by a distinct expression of the amount to which they are to be raised. I myself have often seen the Senator from Illinois interpose to prevent this and other improper legislation, as I conceive, and I think he ought to be sustained by the Senate, and receive its support and respect for doing so. My only regret is that that Senator, with his strong sense and his correct statesmanship, does not more frequently interpose in such matters than is his habit. I trust that in the future we shall have his interposition much more frequently in this line.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

PUBLICATION OF DEBATES.

Mr. ROSS presented a concurrent resolution directing the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives to contract with D. C. Forney for the publication of the debates of the two Houses in the Daily and Congressional Chronicle, and asked that it be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This is a concurrent resolution. Is there any objection to its introduction?

Mr. McDUGALL. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it lies over.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move to take up Senate bill No. 527, to amend the postal laws.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The hour has come for the order of the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business of yesterday must now be taken up, which is the bill (H. R. No. 896) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1868.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Before proceeding to take the vote on the adoption of the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole, I wish to suggest to the honorable Senator from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] who moved the amendment with reference to the salaries of the district judges, that a slight alteration should be made in it which I suppose can be done by unanimous consent, so as to make these salaries commence from and after the 30th of June, 1867, the beginning of the fiscal year.

Mr. POLAND. So far as I am concerned I consent to that modification of the amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think it will be better to begin the fiscal year with the new salaries.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That modification will be made by unanimous consent, if no objection be interposed.

The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in the Committee of the Whole. The Chair will put the question on the amendments collectively, saving and excepting all such amendments as Senators may name, which will be excepted from the general vote of concurrence.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask for a separate vote on the amendment in regard to the salaries of the district judges.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask for a separate vote on the amendment proposed by me increasing the salary of the Chief Clerk and of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask for a separate vote on the additional section I moved to the bill last night I wish to change a few words in it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there any other exceptions to be made? If not the Chair will take the question on the residue of the amendments which have not been especially named.

The amendments not excepted were concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The excepted amendments will now be read in their order.

The Secretary read the first excepted amendment, which was to insert as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That the salary of the district judge of California shall be $5,000; the salaries of the district judges of the districts of Massachusetts, southern and eastern districts of New York, eastern district of Pennsylvania, Maryland, northern district of Illinois, Louisiana, Oregon, and Nevada, shall be $4,500 each; and the salary of the district judge of every other district shall be $4,000 each; and such salaries shall be in full compensation for all official services performed by such judges, and no other allowance or payment shall be made to them for traveling expenses or otherwise; and the amount necessary to pay the increased compensation herein provided for shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Will the Senate concur in the amendment just read?

Mr. SHERMAN. Upon that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 30, nays 6; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Creswell, Davis, Doolittle, Fessenden, Fogg, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Poland, Pomeroy, Ross, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wiley, and Williams—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Grimes, McDougall, Sherman, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—6.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Cowan, Cragin, Dixon, Edmunds, Fowler, Guthrie, Kirkwood, Lane, Norton, Nye, Patterson, Ramsey, Riddle, Saulsbury, and Trumbull—16.

So the amendment was concurred in.

The Secretary read the next excepted amendment, which was to insert as an additional section the following:

And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to direct a geological and topographical exploration of the territory between the Rocky mountains and the Sierra Nevada mountains, including the route or routes of the Pacific railroad: Provided the same can be done without additional appropriation.

Mr. CONNESS. I desire to substitute in place of the words "without additional appropriation" the words "out of existing appropriations." It is a mere clerical correction.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

The Secretary read the next excepted amendment, which was to insert as an additional section the following:

And be it further enacted, That the salary of the Chief Clerk of the Senate shall be $4,000, and that of the Sergeant-at-Arms $3,500 per annum; and that the sum necessary to pay the increased compensation herein provided for the current and ensuing fiscal year be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move to amend the amendment by inserting after "$3,500" in the fifth line the following:

And that of the assistant doorkeeper shall be $2,500: Provided, That section eighteen of an act allowing twenty per cent. on the pay of the officers and employes of the Senate shall not apply to the salaries hereby fixed.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That completes the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole that were excepted.

Mr. POLAND. I desire to move an amendment by direction of the Judiciary Committee. It is to insert as an additional section the following:

And be it further enacted, That from and after the 30th day of June next the annual salary of each of the judges of the Court of Claims shall be $5,000.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope that amendment will not be adopted. The judges of the Court of Claims now get precisely the same that the district judges in this District get, with the exception of the chief justice. He gets $4,500, and the other judges get $4,000. They were increased last year to that amount, and it was perfectly satisfactory to them. I think the salaries now allowed to the judges of the Court of Claims ought not to exceed the salaries allowed to the district judges and the United States district judges throughout the country. They do not render any more services; they do not sit all the year; whereas the district judges are here continually all the year round. I think there is no reason why this increase should be given to the Court of Claims.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I stated last evening why the committee moved this amendment, and should not now repeat it but that there are several Senators present who were not here last evening.

The Court of Claims is now a very important court as connected with the Government. It is required to hold its sessions here at the seat of Government. The judges of that court necessarily have to live here. They are here, have to be here most of the year; and I really know no reason why their salaries should not be as great as those of the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States. I think they ought to be. The justices of the Supreme Court have $6,000, and the Chief Justice $6,500—little enough, in my judgment. Now we are paying the judges of the Court of Claims but $4,000. They are required to reside here; it is an important tribunal; Congress is at every session devolving additional duties upon it. I believe that it is a court which saves to the Government of the United States annually very large sums of money by the investigation of claims against the Government, subjecting them to a critical examination, where we have attorneys employed to see that they are just and are proved before they are allowed. In my judgment, no gentleman fit to be a judge of the Court of Claims can live in Washington upon $4,000 a year. I think the salary fixed by the committee is little enough, and I hope that the Senate will agree to it.

Mr. WADE. Mr. President, I am satisfied that if we increase the salaries of these judges, we shall have to raise the salaries of the judges of the courts of this District. At the last session of Congress we deliberately fixed the salaries of the judges of the supreme court of the District. The judges of that court are just as much engaged in their business as the Court of Claims; they sit all the year round with scarcely any vacation. They are satisfied now probably with the amount that we gave them, but who does not know that if we give this additional salary to the judges of the Court of Claims we shall have to make the judges of the district court even with them, and we can give no reason why it should not be done. Let us make them all alike.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Is the Senator from Ohio aware that the chief justice of the District already has had his salary fixed at $4,500, $500 more than the chief justice of the Court of Claims?

Mr. WADE. Very well. You propose to give the chief justice of the Court of Claims $5,000.

Mr. TRUMBULL. But he has less now.

Mr. WADE. I propose to give him just the same as the other. I have no objection to that. Can you give any reason why they should not be precisely the same? If you do not do it you give general dissatisfaction, and they will be after you to make it even, and you cannot help yourself; you will have to make it so. Your sense of justice will compel you to do it. Let us put it the same as the others, and then it will stay where it is. If we do not it will not lay still until the next session.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio before he takes his seat, if, in his opinion, it is not just to give that salary to the judges of the District, and also to the judges of the Court of Claims?

Mr. WADE. Well, sir, I am never in favor of very high salaries. I think the District judges are contented with their present salary. I think it is enough. I do not think the Government should give any more than will satisfy the incumbents of these offices. They make no complaint; but we know how human nature works. They will think it is an impeachment of their dignity and standing if a court right by the side of them receives a higher salary than they do, and they will not be satisfied with it, and they ought not to be. Therefore I say let us give this court the same, graduate it in the same way, and I am content with it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not think that the reasoning of the honorable Senator from Illinois is sound. These judges of course have an important court and do important business; all courts have important business; but is it of any more importance than the business that is done by other judges? Wherever a judge may be he can but do his duty and give his time to the Government. So far as the duties of these judges are concerned they are not so very hard in point of fact as those of the district judges; because, as I stated, the district judges must be in session all the year round to attend to their duties, whereas everybody knows that the judges of the Court of Claims take a recess in the summer, do not sit here during the hot weather; and I see no reason, therefore, because they have claims against the United States before them, why they should receive more than those who try causes in courts and give all their time to it.

I do not think they should receive the same as the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States. The judges of the Supreme Court of the United States occupy the highest bench in the land, and there ought to be a distinction between them and other courts. Moreover, there ought to be a distinction for another reason. They are obliged not only to come here and live in lodgings during the session of the court, for several months, but when they go home they are obliged to travel all over their respective circuits and work incessantly there, with hardly any time whatever for recreation. To say that there should be no distinction between them and the judges of the Court of Claims is to my mind rather—well, I do not know exactly what word to use, but it is rather strong. I cannot agree to it at all.

If we last year placed the salary of the judges of the district court, who must reside here and do reside here, on a foundation which was satisfactory to them, and of which they make no complaint, I think it is fairly inferable that it is fixed about right; and the judges of the Court of Claims have the same amount.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Oh, no.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly; all except the chief justice. The chief justice gets $4,500 and the rest $4,000.

Mr. SUMNER. What is the salary of the chief justice of the District of Columbia?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Forty-five hundred dollars, and the other judges get $4,000, and the judges of the Court of Claims all get $4,000. I have not understood that there is a question of precedence at the Presidential Mansion or at court anywhere between the chief justice of the Court of Claims and the chief justice of the District of Columbia. If there is, perhaps we had better settle that somehow or other. We must give one $4,500 because the other has it, if that is any reason; but does not the same logic apply to other officers? There are no men in this city who work more hours or harder or have more important business before them than the heads of the several bureaus, and they only get $3,500; some of them $3,000 only to this day. The same remark is true of the Comptrollers and the Auditors. The First Auditor gets but $3,000, and he has accounts for hundreds of millions passing through his hands. He must work all the time. Why should we not put them up to $5,000 in the same way? They hold office but a short time and must live in the city while they hold it; the office is not a permanent one. The general idea is in fixing the salaries of men appointed for life, not to fix them so high as you do the salaries of those who hold only for a short period and must be at greater expense.

There is no force, as it strikes me, in the argument of the honorable Senator from Illinois, and I cannot understand why this matter is urged unless you are going into a general increase of salaries. I think we have gone far enough. The fact is, it seems to me, we are rather in advance of the men themselves in a great many instances; we get disturbed and distressed because officers do not receive more when the officers themselves make no complaints about it, and if one man is put up with the public money. I think there must be some end to this thing, and I hope the Senate will not adopt this amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am by no means certain that the judges of the district court here are satisfied with the amounts which they receive. I have some reason to believe they are not satisfied. However that may be, the question before the Senate is, whether the sum proposed by the Judiciary Committee is too high to pay the judges of the Court of Claims? No one who is acquainted with the cost of living in the city of Washington can doubt for a moment that it is almost impossible to reside here with a family upon a salary of $4,000 in such a way as a judge should be able to live. It is true that it may be said, as has been said by my friend from Maine, that they are not residents here in one sense; that is to say, they take occasionally a recess of one or two months, but nearly the whole of their time is spent here. The winter is spent here, and if they take any recess it is for one or two months in the summer, and I am satisfied from what I have heard from them that they are obliged to deny themselves things which are necessary I think to every gentleman who is upon the bench of any extensive jurisdiction, and which implies for the discharge of its duties judicial ability.

The questions before the Court of Claims are very different from the questions which are brought before the supreme court of the District. They deal in criminal cases and with every species of offense, small and great. Their jurisdiction in civil matters is comparatively unimportant to the public at large, except so far as the public is interested in seeing the rights of suitors carefully attended to. But the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, as we have now given it, is very extensive and involves in its exercise the interests of the Treasury to a large amount. I do not know what may be the amount actually in controversy in the several cases in the Court of Claims, but the number of the cases in that court is very great; and from the character of the claims themselves, the nature of the questions which they present, it requires much more labor in each case to decide it than it does require to decide an ordinary case where the court have the assistance of a jury. These judges have to try the facts as well as the law. The questions of law which are brought before them are often very intricate, very doubtful to any man who is not well acquainted with the general jurisprudence of the nation; and I should be exceedingly unwilling to see upon the Court of Claims any gentleman who was not able to fill the highest judicial office in the country.

I agree with my friend from Maine that there ought to be a distinction between the judges of the Court of Claims and the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, for the reasons which he states; but the judges of the Supreme Court do not get enough. I do not like to refer to individual cases, but the late Chief Justice, who gave his whole life for twenty-four years in the discharge of his duty, and to the satisfaction of all the suitors and the satisfaction of the country, except in a particular instance, who might have earned at the bar, if his health had permitted him, a great deal more, although he lived in the most economical way possible, left the world with a family almost wholly dependent upon others. If he had had a salary at all equal to the salaries which are paid in England to abilities of no greater extent he could have entertained the members of the bar who came here from time to time, the eminent men who belong to the courts abroad, many of whom are from time to time here; but, as it was, so far as I am advised, he never was able to have a single person at his table, either in the morning or in the evening.

Now, these judges, all of them, have families, and they are here the whole year, with the exception of some one or two months; and they are away then because they are exhausted by the labors of the antecedent months, and because the heat of the weather is such that they are unable to discharge the very laborious duties which are upon them in the other months of the year.

Mr. President, what have we done? Upon an average the long session never exceeds six months and the short session three months, making nine months in two years; and for our duties here we get $10,000—$10,000 for nine months of actual service. When we go home those of us who have professions or other employment apply ourselves to such professions or employment and receive whatever additional compensation we may be able to earn. But it is not so with these judges. When they, for the purpose of relaxation, leave their labors here and for a month or two go elsewhere, they have to spend the money, live upon the money which we give. They have no resources at all of acquiring anything else.

I do not think it is an argument against the propriety of this allowance that the officers of the several bureaus, many of whom are highly intelligent men, worthy in all respects, are getting less than the judges of the Court of Claims are. They do not require the same kind of ability as a general rule. They are accounting officers. It is more the ability of the clerk than the ability of the jurist; and the questions which they are called upon to decide are questions very different in general from those which the Court of Claims are called upon to decide; and when they are in doubt they have a right to appeal to the Secretary of the Treasury and ask him to take the opinion of the Attorney General, so as to save themselves the trouble of coming to any conclusion for themselves, if they felt themselves even competent to that task. It seems to me, therefore, looking to the character of the court, the nature of its jurisdiction, and the almost impossibility of living upon the salary, that it is due to the country as well as to the judges that they should be paid at least the sum proposed by the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. HENDRICKS. While I am not able to agree with the Committee on the Judiciary, I am not going to say anything derogatory of the dignity and importance of the Court of Claims. My opinion is, that $4,000 a year for a life office such as this is very good pay, and I know that very many of the best lawyers of the country are willing to take the office at that pay.

The distinguished Senator from Maryland refers to the compensation of members of Congress. Comparisons are never very agreeable; but I will ask the Senator to answer his own argument by replying to this question. He says that for nine months of service members of Congress get $10,000. Does he say that the judges of the Court of Claims for nine months' service ought to be paid out of the Treasury $10,000, they holding a life office?

Mr. JOHNSON. No.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator says no. Then what is his argument? I am not going to speak of the class of men that a fair compensation is supposed to invite into the halls of legislation. The legislative department ought to be filled with the very highest ability that the country can command.

I do not think the duties of either of these judges are equal to the duties required of the First or Second Comptroller. I may be mistaken, but I think their compensation is $3,500. They pass upon hundreds of millions of dollars, not all of them disputed questions or cases, but very many of them are. On behalf of some of my constituents I had occasion the other day to inquire of the Comptroller in regard to his views about a steamer that was lost while in the employment of the Government; and I say to the distinguished Senator from Maryland that that case involved as troublesome questions of law and evidence as ordinarily arise in the courts; more troublesome questions: the question of the liability of the owner of the vessel, in view of the terms of the charter-party and in view of all the facts of the case; how far the facts relieved from a strict performance of the contract on the part of the owners; $20,000 involved; and yet the Comptroller had to take his time at night, I suppose, to examine that question and decide it, and his decision was conclusive—final upon the questions of law and the questions of fact. I suppose he decides a hundred million dollars where this court decides one, not all contested cases, I am free to say, but very many of them contested cases. I suppose the contested cases before the Second Comptroller are ten to one for all the contested cases in the Court of Claims, and he not only represents the party that comes before him, but he has to stand up for the Government, and he has to seek his evidence in defense of the Government's rights wherever he can find it. He has to institute necessary and proper inquiries.

If a comparison were proper at all, my opinion is that the labors of one of these judges are not to be compared, so far as the interests of the people are concerned, with the labors performed either by the First or Second Comptroller. They are very high and very responsible officers indeed, and yet we think that $3,500 is enough for them. I doubt it, so far as they are concerned; but Congress has so fixed it by law. I have not spoken of the Auditors who first pass upon these cases, because their decision is not final. They are not the highest court in the Executive Departments upon these questions. I have spoken only of the Comptrollers.

There has to be some arbitrary limit to this matter, and I believe that a man who gets $4,000 for sitting in the Court of Claims is very well paid in view of the fact that he has a life office. I never heard that they stayed here near all the year. I did not know that was the fact. Two or three years ago I was brought somewhat in contact with some of these judges, and my impression was that about 1868 the labors of the court were very trifling indeed. Very few decisions were made. Perhaps the cases have increased. My impression is that they do not sit here half the year. I may be mistaken about it, but that is my impression. Whether they do or not, they have a life estate; this is a life office, to examine cases. It is not like the Supreme Court of the United States. They discharge just such duties as the Auditors do, with the aid of counsel for the Government who hunt up the evidence. The case is brief; the facts printed; they have to read the printed brief, the printed facts, and they decide upon them, while the Auditors and Comptrollers are to represent the Government and secure the evidence as best they may, and examine the manuscripts. There are not very many questions of law arising in the court, I apprehend. The jurisdiction extends to cases arising under law, contracts, and the regulations of the Department. These cases very soon classify themselves, and the decision of one case I suppose will decide a class, especially if they arise under the regulations of a Department, or if they arise under a law.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is the case with the Comptroller, is it not?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, sir, the same fact would apply to the case of the Comptroller. But a judge of a district court of the United States or of a circuit court of the United States, holding the court for the circuit or for the district, has to decide all questions of law and fact; he is a chancellor in his court, holds a court of chancery, and the most difficult questions that can arise in courts of chancery come before those judges. Questions in the courts of common law are as complicated as the business of this great country can bring before them. I think myself there is no comparison in the dignity and responsibility of the two.

It would be very pleasant for me to vote this money; I would be glad to do it if I thought it was right; but I do not. There has got to be some end to this business of raising salaries. At the last session we fixed $4,000 for the judges of the supreme court of this District, judges whose jurisdiction corresponds with the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States, and, going beyond that also, a local jurisdiction in the District of Columbia. Now, if $4,000 was right there, why shall these other judges have more? The simple question is whether we shall raise both, for if we raise these we have got to go back and undo what we have done and raise the salaries of the judges of the supreme court of the District of Columbia. Although it is disagreeable to say no on a question of this kind, I am going to do it, for I do not think it is right. The people of this country that make their money by hard work do not make any such compensation as the lawyers; and the great body of the lawyers of this country, working all the year with very little relaxation, do not make more money than that. Some men who attain great eminence in their profession can make ten, twenty, and thirty thousand dollars; but they are rare exceptions. As I believe, the labor of the profession is much greater than that performed by these judges. I think the salary is enough.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair) put the question on the amendment, and declared that the Chair was unable to decide.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let us have the yeas and nays. That will settle it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PATTERSON. I ask for the reading of the amendment.

The Secretary read as follows:

And be it further enacted, That from and after the 30th day of June next the annual salary of each of the judges of the Court of Claims shall be $5,000.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 15, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Creswell, Dixon, Doolittle, Foster, Frothinghams, Harris, Howard, Johnson, Norton, Patterson, Poland, Pomeroy, Trumbull, and Van Winkle—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Conness, Cragin, Davis, Fessenden, Henderson, Hendricks, Kirkwood, Lane, Morgan, Morrill, Ross, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Wade, Wiley, and Wilson—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Cattell, Chandler, Cowan, Edmunds, Egan, Fowler, Grimes, Guthrie, Howe, McDougall, Nesmith, Nye, Ramsey, Riddle, Saulsbury, Stewart, Williams and Yates—19.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WADE. I move to amend the bill on page 3, lines fifty-eight and fifty-nine, by striking out the words "in the Daily Globe."

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest to the Senator, if he is going to make a motion to strike out those words, that he had better insert the words "of the Senate daily;" so as to read:

For reporting and printing the proceedings of the Senate daily for the first session of the Fortieth Congress.

Mr. WADE. Very well.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That will present the question.

Mr. WADE. My object in making this amendment is barely to save a conclusion. If we permit this clause to remain as it stands and as agreed on by the House, we may be concluded by it. It is very probable that a good deal of money may be saved by transferring this whole business to the Government printer. I do not know that that ought to be done, but it is a subject worthy of consideration. I hope we shall not conclude ourselves now by settling the matter, because, if we wish to have it as it is here it will be very easy to do it on any other bill, as there will be several appropriation bills come up hereafter; but I believe on consideration it will be found that we shall save money if we take this matter into our hands, and perhaps make other amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio proposes to amend the bill on page 3, lines fifty-eight and fifty-nine, by striking out the words, "in the Daily Globe" and inserting "of the Senate daily;" so that the clause will read:

For reporting and printing the proceedings of the Senate daily, for the first session of the Fortieth Congress, $21,250.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not know, as the Senator from Ohio says, but that it would be better to have the proceedings of Congress published at the Government Printing Office. It may be so. I have not investigated that matter at all, and he has not laid before us any facts. But we know this: that our proceedings for many years have been officially published in what is known as the Globe. The next Congress meets in about three weeks, and when it meets we shall want its proceedings published somewhere; and I suggest to the Senator from Ohio that if we strike out the Daily Globe here we shall have no arrangement with anybody. Now, ought we not to have some arrangement with some one to print the proceedings when Congress meets? It is a very short time to make these arrangements.

I am not very familiar with printing, but I suppose it would take a very considerable establishment, and would occasion a very considerable outlay of money, to make preparation to publish the proceedings of Congress.

Mr. SUMNER. An immense outlay.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is only three weeks from now to the next session, and if you leave the thing loose who is to do it?

I am not sure but that it would be best to have it done in some other way; but it seems to me that when we dispense with our present arrangements for printing our proceedings we ought to substitute some other arrangement. The Senator from Ohio, if I understand him, proposes to have no arrangement with anybody, but to leave to the future to make an arrangement with some one. Who is to do it? There is nobody charged with that duty. We are within a little more than three weeks of the close of the session. The Senator from Massachusetts says it would take an immense outlay of money and a very large establishment to publish our proceedings. You cannot make these arrangements in a day.

I do not pretend to know whether the publication as we now have it is the most economical or best. I only know one thing: our proceedings are very faithfully reported. I think, so far as the Globe is concerned, it contains a very faithful report of our proceedings; and I think you cannot make an arrangement to have it done elsewhere in a moment. What I suggest, therefore, to the Senator from Ohio is, that before we dispense with the Globe we see what we can do elsewhere. I have not looked into the laws; I have not read them; I do not know what our arrangements with the Globe are. I presume the Senator from Ohio has examined the subject and thinks we are under no obligation to continue the publication there. I have not looked into it. If that be so, of course we can dispense with it; but I suggest to him and to the Senate whether we had better dispense with our present arrangements without having anything else?

Mr. SHERMAN. I had occasion to examine the relations of the Government with the printer of the Congressional Globe a number of times when I was a member of the House, and I think it is perfectly clear that there is no contract between the United States and the publishers of the Globe which they cannot at any time annul and which we cannot at any time abrogate. Mr. John C. Rives in his lifetime took that position, and it has always been acquiesced in. He, by a public letter, which I think was presented by the chairman of the Committee on Printing, at one time said he would have to discontinue the publication of the Globe unless Congress would do so and so, and we complied with his terms on the ground that he had a right to discontinue the work, and he could have done it. The whole arrangement has sprung up from various resolutions passed from time to time extending the operations of the Congressional Globe. The whole contract rests upon those resolutions which are like a contract from year to year; but I presume myself that if we make now an appropriation for the next year for the Daily Globe, it would designate and make a contract which in law would be binding upon the United States, because it would be your offer continuing the present arrangement and it would be accepted by them; the appropriations would be made and be beyond our power to recall. I think such an appropriation might be a contract.

Mr. JOHNSON. It would make a contract.

Mr. SHERMAN. My friend from Maryland says it would make a contract, and I think it would; but that would be the only contract. Now, to avoid such a conclusion, I think it would be well to adopt this amendment so that if we choose we may select some other mode of publishing the Congressional Globe. There has been a great deal of controversy about it, and my own judgment has been in favor of publishing it by the Public Printer, where it may be executed as cheaply as possible, in a building we now have the possession of, by officers under the control of the Government, where the paper is purchased in pursuance of bids invited, and where most of the work is done by the day's work; where we can control it at all times and regulate it. That is my present judgment; but at the same time I am not prepared to give any decisive opinion upon that until we have the report of the Committee on Printing. My colleague's amendment, I think, ought to be adopted to prevent the making of a contract by this appropriation, and if it is adopted I shall offer a proposition, which I have written hastily, to provide—

That the joint Committee on Public Printing be directed, by public advertisements, to invite proposals for the execution of the work now done in the publication of the Daily and Congressional Globe, and that they report whether the same may be done with greater economy by the public Printing Office or by accepting one of the bids so offered.

I think that will lay the foundation at least of a fair investigation of the whole matter.

One word more. By the custom which has grown up in the publication of the Globe the proceedings of the called session of the Senate are always made a part of the previous session; so that there need be no trouble about the short session of Congress that will meet immediately following the present session.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That will not be a called session; it will be a regular session.

Mr. SHERMAN. The appropriation for the current fiscal year is probably amply sufficient to cover that. If not, it can be very easily done. This is an appropriation for the next fiscal year, commencing on the 1st of July, and it will give us all the time between the close of the first session of the next Congress and the regular session of the next Congress; so that there is no difficulty.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Allow me to ask the Senator if there is no danger of having nobody to do the work. It will require, as I understand, considerable preparation to do this work, and unless it is understood that somebody is to do it can you be sure that you can get a person at the moment? Congress meets in three or four weeks again.

Mr. SHERMAN. The amendment of my colleague does not prevent a continuation of the work for the current fiscal year. Here is an appropriation for the next fiscal year.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Who is to continue it?

Mr. SHERMAN. The present publishers of the Globe. Their appropriation continues until the 1st of July next, and consequently all the proceedings of Congress until then would be covered by the past appropriation. There is no doubt about that. This appropriation commences from the 1st of July next.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The last appropriation covered only the present Congress, I suppose.

Mr. SHERMAN. By custom—this is all a custom—or rather by resolutions, the proceedings of the called session of the Senate, although it may be of a different Congress, have been included in the debates of the previous Congress, and I have no doubt that some such arrangement will be continued with regard to the short session we may have at the beginning of the next Congress.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator will look at the clause proposed to be amended he will see that it provides for the first session of the Fortieth Congress, and that will be the session commencing on the 4th of March.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That makes this more important.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That makes this specific for that time.

Mr. SHERMAN. That would be wrong. If that would be the construction put upon it the whole thing is wrong, and it ought to be stricken out. There is no necessity for such an appropriation as that for the first session of the next Congress, and perhaps the language ought to be changed. I ask the chairman to look at that. The proposition which I shall make, if my colleague's amendment shall prevail, will provide for that by referring the whole matter to the Committee on Public Printing to make a new arrangement or continue the present one.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, in relation to the printing of the Congressional Globe there is certainly some very strange misrepresentation. There has been placed upon the tables of some of the members of the Senate some publications, without the authority of a name, which states:

"The second section is intended to remunerate Mr. Rives for his real or alleged losses on the publication of the Congressional Globe and Appendix at the prices theretofore agreed upon, namely, $7 50 per column for reporting and publishing the number subscribed for."

The publishers of the Globe cipher out this statement with the following result:

"Three columns to a page, at $7 50 a column, is $22 50 a page.
Four thousand nine hundred and eight pages at $22 50 a page is $110,430 a copy.
Eleven thousand copies at $110,430 a copy is $1,214,730,000."
